It will thus be seen that it was not necessary to decide who were citizens of the United States, and whether or not persons born in the Territories are such by force of the Constitution. This question was not raised and was not decided. It was only contended that the privileges and immunities protected by this amendment, of citizens of the United States, whoever they might be, had been abridged, and the court decided that they had not been. It was contended that there were no privileges and immunities belonging to the citizens of the States as such, distinct from those belonging to citizens of the United States as such, and the court held that there were such privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, that those were left to the State governments for security and protection, and that only those, if any, had been abridged. Surely the dictum in this case will have little weight with the Supreme Court when it comes to consider the question of the citizenship of the inhabitants of Puerto Rico and the Philippines, which has been expressly, and it would seem purposely, left with a different status from that of the inhabitants of any other territory heretofore acquired.

In the case of United States vs. Wong Kim Ark, above cited, which is the last which I have found on this subject, Justice Gray uses the following language:

> The amendment (referring to the fourteenth amendment), in clear words and in manifest intent, includes the children born within the territory of the United States of all other persons (that is, except the children of members of the Indian tribes and the children of ambassadors or ministers, etc., of whatever race or color domiciled within the United States.

It is quite evident from the whole opinion that by the phrases "within the territory of the United States" and "within the United States" the learned justice meant to include all the territory, both within and without the States, over which the sovereignty of the nation extends. But the case was that of a person born within a State. It never has been decided that a person born in a Territory is a citizen of the United States, within the meaning of the Constitution, by force of the Constitution, irrespective of treaty or specific statute, or otherwise than in the broad international and common law sense to which I have referred.

The questions here involved never have arisen as they are presented by the status of the people in Puerto Rico and the Philippines, because in all the decided cases the territory considered has been that in which the provisions of the Constitution under consideration had, by treaty or by statute or by organic acts, been specifically made operative.

In all these cases, which amongst those I have been able to find seem to bear most strongly against my contention, it is well to bear in mind the words of the great chief justice in Cohens vs. Virginia, 6 Wheaton 264, 399.

> It is a maxim not to be disregarded that general expressions, in every opinion, are to be taken in connection with the cases in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case, they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit when the very point is presented for decision. The reason of this maxim is obvious. The question actually before the court is investigated with care and considered in its full extent. Other principles which may serve to illustrate it are considered in their relation to the case decided, but their possible bearing on all other cases is seldom completely investigated.

IV.

And it must further be borne in mind that in all the decided cases which have reference to the subject now under consideration the facts and conditions have been entirely different from those now existing as to the people and territory of Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands by reason of the difference in the treaty stipulations, and also by reason of the operation of statutes which had been passed by Congress extending the Constitution or the laws of the United States, or both, to the territory.

Having now considered these cases, all of which I think I have been able to show are not applicable to the conditions as presented by our latest treaty, I now proceed to present those which, in my judgment, fully sustain my position.

And first let us consider the source of the power to acquire. Having fixed that, it would seem not difficult to find the source of the power to govern and the extent of that power. In American Insurance Company vs. Canter (1 Peters, 511), in which the question was directly involved and decided, at pages 541 and 542, Marshall, Chief Justice, says:

> The course which the argument has taken will require that, in deciding this question, the court should take into view the relations in which Florida stands to the United States. The Constitution confers absolutely on the Government of the Union the power of making war and of making treaties; consequently, that Government possesses the power of acquiring territory either by conquest or by treaty.

This part of the opinion has been quoted over and over again by the Supreme Court, with approval, and has been uniformly cited, with like approval, by all writers on the Constitution. Here the power to acquire is derived from the powers to make war and to make treaties.

But there is a long line of opinions of the same court, in which certain powers are deduced from the objects and scope of the Government created by the Constitution, and from the whole tenor and scope of its language, as inherent and implied powers of national sovereignty; in other words, certain powers implied in and necessarily inherent in sovereignty.

Thus we find Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch vs. Maryland (4 Wheaton, 316), at page 406, saying;

> But there is no phrase in the instrument which, like the Articles of Confederation, excludes incidental or implied powers, etc.

And in Cohens vs. Virginia (6 Wheaton, 264), at page 413:

> That the United States formed for many and for most important purposes a single nation has not yet been denied. In war we are one people; in making peace we are one people. In all commercial regulations we are one and the same people. In many other respects the American people are one; and this Government which is alone capable of controlling and managing their interests in all these respects, is the Government of the Union. It is their Government, and in that character they have no other. America has chosen to be, and in many respects, and to many purposes, a nation; and for all these purposes her Government is complete; to all these objects it is competent.

> They are legislative courts created in virtue of the general right of sovereignty which exists in the Government, etc.

Justice Bradley, in the Legal Tender Cases (12 Wallace, 457), in his concurring opinion, at pages 554, 555, 556:

> The Constitution of the United States established a Government and not a league, compact, or partnership. It was constituted by the people. It is called a Government. In the eighth section of Article I it is declared that Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof. As a Government it was invested with all the attributes of sovereignty.
> The doctrine so long contended for, that the Federal Union was a mere compact of States, and that the States, if they chose, might annul or disregard the acts of the National Legislature, or might secede from the Union at their pleasure, and that the General Government had no power to coerce them into submission to the Constitution, should be regarded definitely and forever overthrown. This has been finally effected by the national power, as it had never been before, by overwhelming argument. The United States is not only a government but it is a national government, and the only government in this country that has the character of nationality. * * *
> Such being the character of the General Government, it seems to be a self-evident proposition that it is invested with all those inherent and implied powers which, at the time of adopting the Constitution, were generally considered to belong to every government as such and as being essential to the exercise of its functions.

Chief Justice Waite, in National Bank vs. County of Yankton (101 U. S., 129), at page 133:

> In the organic act of Dakota there was not an express reservation of power in Congress to amend the acts of the Territorial legislature, nor was it necessary. Such a power is an incident of sovereignty, and continues until granted away.

Justice Field, in the Chinese Exclusion Cases (130 U. S., 581), at page 604:

> While under our Constitution and form of government the great mass of local matters is controlled by local authorities, the United States in their relation to foreign countries and their subjects or citizens are one nation, invested with powers which belong to independent nations, etc.

Justice Miller, in re Nagle (135 U. S., 1), at page 62:

> While it is limited in the number of its powers, so far as its sovereignty extends it is supreme.

Justice Gray, in Jones vs. United States (137 U. S., 202), the Navassa Island case, at page 212:

> By the law of nations, recognized by all civilized states, dominion of new territory may be acquired by discovery and occupation, as well as by cession or conquest; and when citizens or subjects of one nation, in its name and by its authority, or with its assent, take and hold actual, continuous, and useful possession (although only for the purpose of carrying on a particular business, such as catching and curing fish, or working mines) of territory unoccupied by any other government or its citizens, the nation to which they belong may exercise such jurisdiction and for such period as it sees fit over territory so acquired.

And Justice Story, in his work on the Constitution, section 1286, speaking of the cession of the Louisiana Territory:

> The friends of the measure were driven to the adoption of the doctrine that the right to acquire the territory was incident to national sovereignty; that it was a resulting power, growing necessarily out of the aggregate powers confided by the Federal Constitution; that the appropriation might justly be vindicated upon this ground, and also upon the ground that it was for the common defense and general welfare. In short, there is no possibility of defending the constitutionality of this measure but upon the principles of the liberal construction which has been, on other occasions, so earnestly resisted.

And so I might multiply authorities. The italics above are my own.

It must be remembered that in the early days after the adoption of the Constitution, and for a long time afterwards, there were those who, whenever it suited their purposes, contended for so strict and limited a construction of that instrument that they held that there was no power in the General Government not granted in express terms, and some went so far even as to deny to the Federal Union the right of self-preservation. Hence the judges very naturally, as far as possible, sought in that instrument for some express provision to justify any exercise of power. But here we find, beginning with Chief Justice Marshall, a progressive interpretation, deriving from it necessarily certain inherent and implied powers, so that when Justice Bradley said that the Government of the United States was "invested with all the inherent and implied powers which, at the time of adopting the Constitution, were generally considered to belong to every government as such, and as being essential to the exercise of its functions," he but stated what has come to be the accepted doctrine.

And so Chief Justice Marshall would only have stated what is now too firmly established to be disputed, if he had derived the right of acquisition not only from the power to make war and to make treaties, but also from those inherent and implied powers of sovereignty existing in every independent and sovereign nation. On no other ground can the right of acquisition by discovery and occupation, recognized in Jones vs. United States, supra, be justified.

And if the power of acquisition in the United States is derived from the inherent and implied powers of national sovereignty, common to every nation as such, would it not necessarily follow that by virtue of the same powers we have the right of government in territory acquired? If the Government of the United States is the representative of the national sovereignty of the people of the United States as the British Crown and Parliament are the representatives of the national sovereignty of Great Britain, would not the Government of the United States, through its political departments—the executive and legislative—have the same power of governing territory acquired by virtue of its inherent right of sovereignty as a nation as the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain have of governing British territory, or as the representatives of the sovereignty of any other nation would have?

Judge Story, in his work on the Constitution, section 1328, says:

> The power of Congress over the public territory is clearly exclusive and universal, and their legislation is subject to no control, but is absolute and universal, unless so far as it is effected by stipulations in the cession or by the ordinance of 1787, under which any of it has been settled.

And again, at section 1324:

> As the General Government possesses the right to acquire territory, either by conquest or by treaty, it would seem to follow as an inevitable consequence that it possesses the power to govern what it has acquired. The territory does not, when so acquired, become entitled to self-government, and it is not subject to the jurisdiction of any State. It must, consequently, be under the dominion and jurisdiction of the Union, or it would be without any government at all. In cases of conquest, the usage of the world is, if a nation is not wholly subdued, to consider the conquered territory as merely held by military occupation until its fate shall be determined by a treaty of peace. But during this intermediate period it is exclusively subject to the government of the conqueror. In case of confirmation or cession by treaty, the acquisition becomes firm and stable, and the ceded territory becomes a part of the nation to which it is annexed, either on terms stipulated in the treaty or on such as its new master shall impose.
> The relations of the inhabitants with each other do not change, but their relations with their former sovereign are dissolved, and new relations are created between them and their new sovereign. The act transferring the country transfers the allegiance of its inhabitants. But the general laws not strictly political remain as they were until altered by the new sovereign. If the treaty stipulates that they shall enjoy the privileges, rights, and immunities of citizens of the United States, the treaty as a part of the law of the land becomes obligatory in these respects. Whether the same effect would result from the mere fact of their becoming inhabitants and citizens by the cession without any express stipulation may deserve inquiry if the question should ever occur. But they do not participate in political power until they become a State and are admitted into the Union as such. Until that period the territory remains subject to the Government in such manner as Congress shall direct, under the clause of the Constitution now under consideration.

In the last section he follows and uses almost the exact language of Chief Justice Marshall in American Insurance Company vs. Canter, supra.

And in the case of United States vs. Kagama (118 U. S., 375, 380) Justice Miller says:

> But this power of Congress to organize Territorial governments and make laws for their inhabitants arises not so much from the clause in the Constitution in regard to disposing of and making rules and regulations concerning the Territory and other property of the United States as from the ownership of the country in which the Territories are and the right of exclusive sovereignty, which must exist in the National Government and can be found nowhere else. (Murphy vs. Ramsey, 114 U. S., 15, 44.)

If, then, there were no clause in the Constitution conferring upon Congress the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States (Art. IV, sec. 3, subs. 2) (and it may be said of this clause that it only strengthens the position and makes clear the intention of the makers of the Constitution), would not the power to acquire by reason of its national sovereignty necessarily imply the power to govern by reason of its national sovereignty? And would not this power be unlimited, unless so far as it is affected by stipulations in the cessions, as Judge Story has expressed it? It would seem that there could be but one answer.

Those who contend that the limitations of the Constitution apply, and who think that those limitations would be fatal to the successful government of these islands and their people, are driven to the position that a civil government prescribed by Congress for them must be left for the indefinite future, and that in the meantime they must be left to the will of the President, executed by the President's representatives. In other words, that while the limitations of the Constitution would at once apply and be binding as to any government that might be prescribed by Congress, those limitations would not apply and be binding as to any government prescribed and carried on by the President; that territory whose acquisition has become complete, and in which there is no state of war or insurgency, can be kept under the absolute and unrestrained rule of the President, free from the limitations of the Constitution, for an indefinite and unlimited period, but that immediately upon the action of Congress those limitations take effect; that those limitations do not apply to the acts of the President, not enforcing martial law, or not exercising the rights and powers of belligerency, which implies war or insurgency, but do apply to the acts of Congress; that one department of the Government created by the Constitution is free to act in regard to territory acquired untrammeled by its limitations, while another is not.

It would seem to be self-evident that the limitations of the Constitution, after peace has been restored and a treaty has been made, and acquisition is complete, bind all of the departments of the Government, if they bind any; that if those limitations do not apply to the Executive in his government of acquired territory, under these conditions, they would not apply to Congress in its government of such territory. And this view seems to be made absolutely conclusive by the fact that the Constitution has, in a clause containing and implying no limitations, given to Congress the power of governing such territory, while it nowhere confers such power on the Executive, and such power has only been recognized as pertaining to the Executive while in the exercise of the belligerent rights of a conqueror or in the suppression of insurrection and the restoration of peace and order.

But when we say that the United States has power to acquire territory by virtue of its inherent and implied powers of sovereignty, and after acquiring it has power to govern it by virtue of the same powers, we deduce at once the power in the President, as the representative of that sovereignty, to govern it until Congress acts, untrammeled by the limitations of the Constitution which are not in express terms made applicable to such territory, and the same power in Congress as representing that sovereignty when Congress comes to act.

In American Insurance Company vs. Canter, supra, the court says at page 541:

> The usage of the world is, if a nation be not entirely subdued, to consider the holding of conquered territory as a mere military occupancy until its fate shall be determined at the treaty of peace. If it be ceded by the treaty, the acquisition is confirmed, and the ceded territory becomes a part of the nation to which it is annexed, either on the terms stipulated in the treaty of cession or on such as its new master shall impose. On such transfer of territory it has never been held that the relations of the inhabitants with each other undergo any change. Their relations with their former sovereign are dissolved, and new relations are created between them and the government which has acquired their territory. The same act which transferred their country transferred the allegiance of those who remained in it; and the law which may be denominated political is necessarily changed, although that which regulates the intercourse and general conduct of individuals remains in force until altered by the newly created power of the state.

And again at page 543:

> It has been already stated that all the laws which were in force in Florida while a province of Spain, those excepted which were political in their character, which concerned the relations between the people and their sovereign, remained in force until altered by the Government of the United States. Congress recognizes this principle by using the words "Laws of the Territory now in force therein." No laws could then have been in force but those enacted by the Spanish Government.

That is, until the territory is ceded by the treaty of peace, it is considered that the holding of such territory is a mere military occupation. When the acquisition is complete, however, by cession, then the laws which were in force while the territory was a part of another nation, those excepted which are political in their character, as, for instance, those attaching to the obligations of allegiance and protection, remain in force until Congress acts. After complete acquisition, and until Congress acts to change them, the former local laws apply, and the President administers them through his agents.

And there is nothing in Cross vs. Harrison (16 How., 164) which conflicts with this. This is a very different thing from their being subject to the absolute and untrammeled will of the President. During this time, if the laws of the former sovereign made no provision for juries or grand juries, the limitations contained in Amendments V, VI, and VII could not be in force without permitting criminals to go untried and unpunished, and rights which, under our system, would be tried in suits at common law, to be without a remedy, for there would be no way of securing a jury under the law.

I do not think anyone would contend that the Constitution would require or permit any such result. Yet it must require it, if its limitations apply to the government by the President while administering the laws of the former sovereign. And would it not be absurd to say that the President could administer the laws of another sovereign free from such limitations while he could not so administer laws passed by our own sovereignty? The only escape is to say that these limitations do not apply, and that as we have the right to acquire by virtue of the inherent powers of national sovereignty, so we have the right to govern by virtue of the same powers; that the Constitution only confirms and strengthens that right by the express provision of the fourth article; and that in the government of such Territory we are as free from all limitations, not by the Constitution expressly made applicable, as England or any other nation would be. [Applause.]

It would seem to be impossible to harmonize the position taken by the Supreme Court as to courts in the Territories and as to the clause of the fourth article, above referred to, with any other view than that which I have taken. I have already cited and quoted from the case of American Insurance Company vs. Canter. I now call attention to the following opinions, and I might cite others:

Story on the Constitution, section 1328, page 230:

"The power of Congress over the public territory is clearly exclusive and universal; and their legislation is subject to no control, but is absolute and unlimited, unless so far as it is affected by stipulations in the cessions, or by the ordinance of 1787, under which any part of it has been made."

Serè vs. Pitot (Cranch, 333, 336), opinion by Marshall, Chief Justice:

"The power of governing and of legislating for a Territory is the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire and to hold territory. Could this position be contested, the Constitution of the United States declares that 'Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.' Accordingly, we find Congress possessing and exercising the absolute and undisputed power of governing and legislating for the Territory of Orleans. Congress has given them a legislative, an executive, and a judiciary, with such powers as it has been their will to assign to those departments, respectively."

Benner vs. Porter (9 How., 235, 242), opinion by Nelson, judge:

"The distinction between the Federal and State jurisdictions, under the Constitution of the United States, has no foundation in these Territorial governments; and consequently no such distinction exists, either in respect to the jurisdiction of their courts or the subjects submitted to their cognizance. They are legislative governments, and their courts legislative courts, Congress in the exercise of its powers in the reorganization and government of the Territories combining the power of both the Federal and State authorities. Their is but one system of government or of laws operating within their limits, as neither is subject to the constitutional provisions in respect to Federal and State jurisdiction.

"They are not organized under the Constitution, nor subject to its complex distribution of the powers of government as the organic law, but are the creations exclusively of the legislative department and subject to its supervision and control. Whether or not there are provisions in that instrument which extend to and act upon these Territorial governments it is not now material to examine. We are speaking here of those provisions that refer particularly to the distinction between Federal and State jurisdiction."

National Bank vs. County of Yankton (101 U. S., 12 supra).

Murphy vs. Ramsey (114 U. S., 15, 44), opinion by Mathews, judge:

"The counsel for appellant in argument seems to question the constitutional power of Congress to pass the act of March 22, 1882, so far as it abridges the rights of electors in the Territory under previous laws. But that question is, we think, no longer open to discussion. It has passed beyond the state of controversy into final judgment. The people of the United States as sovereign owners of the national Territories have supreme power over them and their inhabitants. In the exercise of this sovereign dominion they are represented by the Government of the United States, to whom all the powers of government over that subject have been delegated, subject only to such restrictions as are expressed in the Constitution, or are necessarily implied in its terms, or in the purposes and object of the power itself; for it may well be admitted in respect to this, as to every power of society over its members, that it is not absolute and unlimited."

United States vs. Gratiot (14 Peters, 526, 537), opinion by Thompson, judge:

"And the Constitution of the United States (Article IV, sec. 3) provides: 'That Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.' The term territory, as here used, is merely descriptive of one kind of property, and is equivalent to the word lands. And Congress has the same power over it as over any other property belonging to the United States. And this power is vested in Congress without limitation and has been considered the foundation upon which the Territorial governments rest."

Shively vs. Bowlby (152 U. S., 1, 48), opinion by Gray, justice:

"By the Constitution, as is now well settled, the United States having rightfully acquired the Territories, and being the only government which can impose laws upon them, have the entire dominion and sovereignty, national and municipal, Federal and State, over all the Territories so long as they remain in a Territorial condition."

Talbott vs. Silver Bow County (139 U. S., 438, 445, 446), opinion by Brewer, justice:

"But the whole argument fails when applied to a Territory. It is not a distinct sovereignty. It has no independent powers. It is a political community organized by Congress, all whose powers are created by Congress, and all whose acts are subject to Congressional supervision. Its attitude to the General Government is no more independent than that of a city to the State in which it is situated, and which has given to it its municipal organization."

Endlemen vs. United States (86 Fed. Rep., 456, 459), opinion by Morrow, justice:

"The answer to these and other like objections urged in the brief of counsel for defendant is found in the now well-established doctrine that the Territories of the United States are entirely subject to the legislative authority of Congress. They are not organized under the Constitution nor subject to its complex distribution of the powers of Government as the organic law, but are the creation exclusively of the legislative department and subject to its supervision and control. (Benner vs. Porter, 9 How., 235, 242.) The United States having rightfully acquired the territory and being the only government which can impose laws upon it, has the entire dominion and sovereignty, national and municipal, Federal and State."

See also Utter vs. Franklin (172 U. S., 416, 423).

It will be seen that Chief Justice Marshall, remembering what he had said in Serè vs. Pitot, supra, made use of the language used in American Insurance Company vs. Canter as to the Territorial court in Florida. These cases have been uniformly followed and approved, and from them it is clear that the established doctrine of the court is that "the judicial power of the United States" provided for in the third article of the Constitution means, according to the decisions of our highest court, the judicial power of the Federal Government as exercised within the territory comprised within the States, and has no reference to the judicial power exercised under Federal legislation in the Territories; that the courts of the Territories are created in virtue of the general right of sovereignty which exists in the Government or of the clause of the fourth article authorizing Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories belonging to the United States; that Congress may by virtue of these powers establish there such courts as it may see fit; may give to them such jurisdiction as it may deem proper, including admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, notwithstanding the provision of Article III on that subject; and, notwithstanding the provision as to life tenure, may provide for the appointment of judges whose terms of office shall be limited and who may be removed at the pleasure of the appointing power.

Surely here are some of the limitations entirely disregarded, and all on the ground that they are not constitutional courts, but are organized under and by virtue of the general right of sovereignty which exists in the Government, or the needful rules and regulations clause. Here, too, is a case of the exercise of power under that clause independent of the limitations in other parts of the instrument.

It would seem that this ought to be conclusive. But mark also what is said as to the Government of the United States, by the Constitution, having the entire dominion and sovereignty, national and municipal, Federal and State, over all the Territories. As to them there is no partition of sovereignty. It is all in the United States. In legislating for the Territories Congress has the powers both of the Federal Government and of the State governments. In other words, as to the Territories it has every sovereign power of legislation.

Now, note the decision of the Supreme Court in Barron vs. Baltimore (7 Peters, 243), which has been uniformly followed and approved. (Fox vs. Ohio, 5 How., 410; Withers vs. Buckley, 20 How., 84; Twitchell vs. The Commonwealth, 7 Wallace, 321; Edward vs. Elliot, 20 Wallace, 532; Pierson vs. Yewdall, 95 U. S., 294; Davis vs. Texas, 139 U. S., 651; Talton vs. Mayes, 163 U. S., 376.) In all these cases the doctrine announced is that the limitations on the powers of the General Government in the Constitution, expressed in general terms, are not applicable to the States, but were adopted to quiet the fears of the States, and as limitations upon the exercise of the powers of the General Government in reference to the people of the States adopting it and united under it. [Applause.]

Now, if the General Government, in legislating for the Territories and their people, has the legislative powers both of the General Government and of the States with respect to their people, in virtue of the general right of sovereignty which exists in the General Government, or in virtue of the plenary-power clause of the fourth article, and if the States in their legislative powers for their own people are not restrained by the limitations expressed in general terms in the Constitution of the United States, would it not necessarily follow that the General Government in legislating for the Territories is not restrained by those limitations? And would not the conclusion be inevitable that Congress, in its legislation in respect to the Territories, would have those absolute and plenary powers of undivided sovereignty which, at the time of adopting the Constitution, were generally considered to belong to every government as such? There would seem to be but one answer. And thus we find that in the thirteenth amendment, and in those other provisions to which I have referred, where it was intended that the inhibition should apply wherever the sovereignty of the United States extended, words are used which convey directly, and without any possibility of mistake or misconstruction, that meaning.

The following question is sometimes asked by those taking the opposite view, and they seem to think that it is absolutely conclusive of the matter: "Can the Government of the United States, the creature of the Constitution, having lawful existence only by virtue of the Constitution, go anywhere in the exercise of its powers and jurisdiction unaccompanied by the Constitution?"

It would seem at first blush to be hard to answer, and yet it has been answered, and answered completely, in the case In re Ross (140 U. S., 453).

The case was this: Ross, a seaman on board a United States ship lying in the harbor of Yokohama, Japan, killed one Kelly, the second mate of the vessel. He was arrested and confined in jail in Yokohama, and was subsequently tried, convicted of murder, and condemned to death by a consular court, sitting in Yokohama consisting of the United States consul-general and four associates. During the trial motion was made on his behalf for a trial by jury, which was refused. After his conviction and sentence the President commuted the penalty from death to imprisonment for life in the penitentiary at Albany, N. Y. He was brought from Yokohama to the Albany penitentiary and there incarcerated. After he had been confined there for some years motion was made in the circuit court of the United States for his discharge, on the ground that his trial, conviction, sentence, and imprisonment were in violation of the Constitution. The circuit court denied the motion, and an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, where the order of the lower court was affirmed.

The authority under which the consular court was organized and acted was derived from treaties between the United States and Japan, wherein it was provided that Americans committing offenses in Japan were to be tried by the American consul-general, or consul, and punished according to American laws, and from acts of the Congress of the United States investing ministers and consuls of the United States to Japan with judicial power over such cases, providing for the organization of the consular court, and prescribing the manner of procedure in which that power should be exercised.

Attempt has been made to distinguish this case by giving to the language of the court the meaning that the Government of Japan authorized the American consul to exercise jurisdiction according to any form of procedure which his Government might prescribe, and only required that the punishment should be inflicted according to American law, and that in the procedure, in arraignment and trial, the lawmaking power of the United States had the permission of Japan to prescribe such regulations as it might think proper, the lawmaking power of the United States acting in this respect for the Japanese Government. This would seem to be exceedingly farfetched. But the fact still remains, and it would seem to be a complete answer to this position, that the court was organized and its procedure was had under a law of the Congress of the United States.

I can not better give the real meaning of the decision in this case than by quoting the words of Dr. Talcott Williams, of Philadelphia, in Annals of the American Academy, Supplement, May, 1899. He says:

> Any confusion on this subject arises from failing to discriminate between the limits of sovereignty and constitutional jurisdiction. * * * Sovereignty and jurisdiction may be coterminous. Either may exist where the other is absent. The sovereignty of the United States sentenced in Japan to death, and provided for the imprisonment of Ross for life in Albany, a stronger case than the finding in Japan, because the sentence had to be executed within our constitutional limits, but no one will pretend that the constitutional jurisdiction of the United States applied in either case, because if it had a jury would have been necessary, and the Supreme Court wisely found the authority for dealing with the life and liberty of an American citizen, not in any special grant of power to Congress, but in the necessity for the exercise of the international powers of an independent sovereignty. * * *
> The Constitution created a constitutional jurisdiction within certain defined limits, to wit, the States which formed the Union. It also created a nation with the usual international powers needed and demanded by an independent nation, recognized and acting as such under the law of nations. * * * When this national sovereignty acts within the sphere of constitutional jurisdiction it is limited by constitutional provisions. When, as a national sovereignty, it acts within the international field, it has whatever powers are needed for its work as such, a principle established by a long series of decisions (Fong Yue Ting vs. United States, 149 U. S., 712.) Sovereignty is exercised over conquered territory under no specific constitutional power, but as a part of the rights inherent in the international nation created by the Constitution. Legislation by treaty or statute (American Insurance Company vs. Canter, 1 Peters, 511) decides when the constitutional jurisdiction shall be coterminous with this national sovereignty, etc. * * *
> Sovereignty, in short, moves with the international acts of the nation. Constitutional jurisdiction travels with the municipal law of the United States, and is created by a treaty because it is a part of that law. Nor does any decision, not even that cited referring to the District of Columbia, traverse this distinction, for the simple reason, if no other, that a treaty annexing territory without conferring civil rights—that is, extending constitutional jurisdiction in greater or less degree—has never yet been before our courts. I submit, therefore, that in dealing with territory thus annexed there may be found a power wider than that simply "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting territory and other property," to wit, the broader national power which permits annexation itself, though the Constitution makes no provision for the act, and under which power a long series of statutes have been passed and even juryless courts created as part of national sovereignty, and not part of our municipal constitutional jurisdiction.

The course of decisions in regard to the Indian tribes, subject as they are to the sovereignty of the United States and living in territory subject to that sovereignty, are also suggestive. In regard to them it has never been considered that the power of Congress was limited by the Constitution. These semi-independent tribes have always been recognized as exempt from our laws, whether within or without the limits of an organized State or Territory, and in regard to their domestic government left to their own rules and traditions. (Ex parte Crow Dog, 109 U. S., 556; United States vs. Joseph, 94 U. S., 614, 617; United States vs. Kagama, 118 U. S., 375; Talton vs. Mayes, 163 U. S., 376.)

Now, if Congress can establish such courts and provide such procedure as that established and provided for the trial of Ross in foreign territory, and can provide for or permit such procedure as may be required by the rules and traditions of an Indian tribe in our own territory, unrestricted by any provision of the Constitution, surely the reasoning which I have given should not be considered strained and artificial to show that the constitutional limitations do not apply to legislation for territory acquired as our new possessions have been.

It will be noted, Mr. Speaker, that there is one decision of the Supreme Court to which I have made no reference, the case of Scott vs. Sanford, commonly known as the Dred Scott Case. I have purposely refrained from making any reference to this case. It is possible I might have found something to sustain my argument in that case, where it was decided that a free man of the African race, whose ancestors were brought to this country and sold as slaves, was not a citizen of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution, and that, too, in the face of the fact that such persons were recognized as citizens and given all the privileges of citizens in several of the States. That case never was entitled to the respect of honest men, either lawyers or laymen. All of it was absolute obiter dictum, except that part relating to the jurisdiction of the court; and it long since, in the language of an eminent justice of the Supreme Court, became a useless incumbrance in the reports of that high tribunal.

V.

Having examined the provisions of the Constitution and the opinions of the Supreme Court touching the question now under discussion, I might now cite a great number of historical and legislative precedents sustaining my contention. But I will not take the time of the House by thus adding to a speech which is already too long. I desire, however, to call the attention of the House very briefly to the acquisition of Louisiana (the first acquisition of territory which did not already belong to the United States, or to one of the States, after the adoption of the Constitution) and to the first legislation had in regard thereto. We shall find much here that is instructive, and perhaps something that ought to be startling, to those who in these days are inveighing so strongly both against our right to acquire and our ability to govern, and especially to those who are in the habit of deifying Mr. Jefferson.

A very brief examination of the views of one or two of the most prominent statesmen of that period and of the debates in Congress will show that none of those entertaining different views, with the exception of Mr. Jefferson, contended against the right of acquisition, and that the differences arose principally on questions of government and as to whether the treaty-making power could, under the Constitution, provide in the treaty of cession for the admission into the Union of acquired territory, or for special commercial privileges to ports in such territory, and as to whether, without a clear violation of that instrument, foreign territory could be admitted to the status of States at all.

The purchase and cession of that Territory was a political event of as great, if not far greater, importance than the recent cessions. We find Mr. Jefferson, as usual, doubting and asserting that it was a direct violation of the Constitution; writing to one that the Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, and that it should be amended (letter to Breckenridge, Jefferson's Works, volume 4, page 500), to another that our peculiar security is in the possession of a written Constitution and that we should not make it a blank paper by construction, and cautioning that, if it must be done, it should be done as quietly as possible, and signifying his willingness to acquiesce, if his friends should not agree with him, and trusting that the evil of construction might be corrected when it shall produce ill effects. (Letter to Nicholas, Jefferson's Works, volume 4, page 505.)

On the other hand, we find Mr. Gallatin laying down the broad doctrine since so fully sanctioned by the decisions of the Supreme Court:

> (1) That the United States as a nation have an inherent right to acquire territory; (2) that whenever that acquisition is by treaty the same constituted authorities in whom the treaty-making power is vested have a constitutional right to sanction the acquisition; (3) that whenever the territory has been acquired Congress have the power either of admitting into the Union as a new State, or of annexing to a State with the consent of that State, or of making regulations for the government of such territory.—Writings of Albert Gallatin, volume 1, pages 113, 114.

And Mr. Nicholas, that—

> There is nothing in the Constitution that limits the treaty-making power except the general limitations of the other powers given to the Government and the evident objects for which the Government was instituted.

Jefferson subsequently acquiesced in Mr. Gallatin's views as to the power of acquisition (Writings of Albert Gallatin, volume 1, page 115), and when the matter reached Congress the members also seemed to have adopted them, and there was substantially no question raised by any member of either of the great parties of the day as to the right of the President and Senate to make the treaty so far as the mere acquisition of territory was concerned, and thus bring that vast territory under the sovereignty of the United States.

As to the right to make a treaty of acquisition, all were agreed. Randolph, Jeffersonian Republican, said that the power to settle disputes as to boundaries involved the power of extending boundaries; Nicholson, Jeffersonian Republican, that a sovereign nation had a right to acquire new territory under the war power and the treaty-making power; that the right must exist somewhere as essential to independent sovereignty; Cæsar Rodney, Jeffersonian Republican, that there was no reason why within the fair meaning of this general provision (the general-welfare clause) is not included the power of increasing territory if necessary for the general welfare or common defense; that the words of the Constitution which give Congress the authority to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into effect the foregoing powers vested in us every power necessary for carrying such a treaty into effect; that as for the special privilege of trade accorded to New Orleans, it violated in no way the Constitution; Taylor, Jeffersonian Republican and mover of the Virginia resolutions, that it was derived from the war power and the treaty-making power; Breckenridge, Jeffersonian Republican and mover of the Kentucky resolutions, that it was derived from this source.

On the other side, the Federalists all admitted that the power to acquire territory was vested in the Government under the war and treaty-making powers and also by the inherent right of sovereignty. They only contended that there was no right to admit foreign country as an associate in the Union without the assent of each individual State, or to give the port of New Orleans special privileges over the other ports of the country. To these contentions Nicholson replied that the right to acquire territory was one thing, but the right to admit that territory into the Union quite another thing, which he refused to discuss as not before the House; that as to the privilege to the port of New Orleans, this territory was purchased by the United States in their confederate capacity, and might be disposed of by them at pleasure; that it was in the nature of a colony whose commerce might be regulated without any reference to the Constitution. And Randolph replied that the stipulation as to the port of New Orleans was a part of the price of the territory; and as to the admission of new associates into the Union, so far as the Constitution was concerned we might admit Great Britain or France; that the only reason we could not was because we could not.

And it was on this subject of admission to the Union afterwards that the speech of Josiah Quincy so often alluded to was made, not as to the acquisition of the territory. So, also, we find Gouverneur Morris, who drew the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution, approving the acquisition, but condemning the clause of the treaty pledging the admission of the territory into the Union, and saying that he always thought that when we should acquire Louisiana, as he always thought we would, it would be proper to govern it as a province, and that in drawing this section he had gone as far as circumstances would permit to establish the exclusion. (Letters to Henry W. Livingston, December 4, 1803, and Jonathan Dayton, January 7, 1804.)

The first legislation for the government of this Territory was the act passed October 31, 1803 (2 U. S. Stat., 245), which it may not be amiss to note was approved and carried into effect by Mr. Jefferson. The people of that Territory were restless, uneasy, and dissatisfied, and provision had to be made for their government and control. By this act the President was given absolute power. He was authorized to take possession and maintain the authority of the United States, and to make use for that purpose of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia to the number of 80,000, and to vest in such person or persons as he might appoint all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government, to be exercised in such manner as he might direct.

Mr. Jefferson immediately appointed one person, Governor Claiborne, to exercise all the powers both of the governor-general and intendant, which had theretofore been vested in different individuals, and the latter of which had to some extent been a check upon the former. He thus made him substantially a temporary king, and intrusted to him the administration of a system of laws entirely unknown to and in many respects in violation of our Constitution. It may be noted that there was a religious establishment, and that canons and curates received salaries from the public treasury. Nobody but John Quincy Adams had made any effort at amending the Constitution to fit the case, and he had received not only no encouragement but positively hostile action from the Jeffersonian Republicans. This bill was reported by John Randolph, of Virginia, the chairman of the committee, and when the Federalists objected that the powers conferred on the President by it were unconstitutional, he defended it on the ground of necessity and maintained that with respect to this territory the United States possessed the powers of European sovereignty.

Others defended on the ground that Congress have a power in the Territories which they can not exercise in the States, and that the limitations of power found in the Constitution are applicable to States and not to Territories. Thus defended by the Jeffersonian Republicans, the bill passed. It is true that this was a temporary measure, intended rather for the taking possession of than for the government of the Territory. But it is well to note the grounds on which it was justified and the doctrine announced—that in the Territories Congress is unrestrained by the limitations of the Constitution.

Shortly afterwards, on the 26th of March, 1804, a further act was passed for the government of this Territory. By this bill it was divided into two parts, that north of the thirty-third parallel to be known as the district of Louisiana and subject to the Territorial government of the Indiana Territory, that south of that parallel to be known as the Territory of Orleans and to be governed as prescribed in the act. In this government the people of Louisiana, numbering 50,000 persons in an old and established society, were to have no voice, and were in no way consulted about it or asked to consent to it. The governor, secretary, and legislative council of thirteen, and judicial officers were all to be appointed by the President. In the selection of none of these officers were the people to have any voice, and the governor and legislative council were invested with full legislative powers.

This bill was reported to the Senate by Breckenridge, of Kentucky, Jeffersonian Republican, and mover in the legislature of Kentucky of the Kentucky resolutions. This bill was violently assailed in the House by members of both parties and was amended, but was passed as it came from the Senate, with the exception that the time of its operation was limited to one year from the 1st day of the following October, to which time the act of October 31, 1803, was to remain in force. It may be said of this act also that it was only to be operative for a limited time, and until Congress should provide for that Territorial government which was afterwards put into operation and remained so until the admission of Louisiana as a State; but it may be pertinent to inquire whether, if Congress had the right to provide for the government of this Territory by these two acts for nearly two years, it would not have had the right to so govern it for a longer time; and if so, for how much longer time? Who could determine that but Congress itself?

Was there any consent of the governed, either in the negotiation and ratification of the treaty or in this legislation passed to make it effective and to govern the people of the acquired territory, when the Louisianians had shed tears, as was alleged in the debate, when the American flag was raised in place of the French? And on what ground could either be justified other than those on which they were justified—that the power was an inherent power of the sovereign nation created by the people when the Constitution was adopted? All this was done by the Government of the United States in the complete control of Jefferson and his party. And I have alluded to it not because I think Mr. Jefferson or his followers were infallible or even authoritative interpreters of the Constitution, but in the hope that it may challenge the attention of those who in these days are accustomed to worship at the shrine of Jeffersonian idolatry.

Thus we see that the view which I have taken was the one entertained by statesmen like Gallatin, and indeed all the statesmen of the early years of the century (with the possible exception of Jefferson, who at least acquiesced), before there had been or could be any judicial decisions on this subject. (For we must remember that the status of the Northwest Territory was entirely different from that of any subsequently acquired.) And not only did they entertain this view, but in their legislation they did not seem to give to the principle of "the consent of the governed" the meaning now sought to be attached to it.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that there is not one of us who does not thoroughly believe in that principle announced in the great Declaration. But there are some of us who believe that the consent should be at least first expressed in a legal and orderly and unmistakable manner by a people capable of its intelligent expression, and that it can not be inferred from the will of the minority or from actions instigated by the intrigues and deceptive influences of ambitious, designing, and selfishly interested individuals, and that, except with this qualification, it would be destructive of all organized government. If its meaning had been construed in the past to be that which is now claimed for it by some persons, we would not now have one undivided and indestructible Union. Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. These are the essential things, and these they shall enjoy as they have never enjoyed them before.

VI.

I conclude, then, Mr. Chairman, from an examination of the Constitution, the opinions of our highest judicial tribunal, and the history of our country and its legislation on this subject, that we have clearly the same latitude of action in regard to our recently acquired possessions that England has in regard to her dependencies, save and except only as I have herein indicated.

Whether forbidden by the Constitution or not, surely no member of this body will ever wish, or even dare, as to them, to authorize or permit arrests by general warrant; or authorize or permit excessive bail to be required; or authorize or permit any unreasonable delay in the trial of a person held to answer for crime; or authorize or permit one accused to be deported for trial outside the district fixed by law; or authorize or permit secret trial; or authorize or permit one accused to be deprived of the right to have counsel, to be informed of the nature and cause of his arraignment, to confront the witnesses against him, and to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; or authorize or permit him to be compelled to give testimony against himself; or authorize or permit him to be prosecuted a second time for the same offense; or authorize or permit the imposition of any excessive fines or cruel or unusual punishments; or authorize or permit property to be taken for a public purpose without making just compensation therefor; or authorize or permit the seizure of property by general search warrants; or authorize or permit soldiers to be quartered in any house in time of peace without the consent of the owner, or in time of war except as prescribed by law; or authorize or permit any person to be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; or authorize or permit unjust or unequal taxes to be imposed.

If any such there ever shall be here, he will be found only amongst those who are accustomed to exert every faculty of brain and energy of body to devise methods by which others may be deprived of rights which they themselves claim and enjoy, or else amongst those who are the beneficiaries of such methods. He will not come from the great State of Minnesota, which I have the honor in part here to represent, nor from any of those great States where it is the pride and delight of all to enforce equal rights and equal and exact justice for all.

And to whom can all this subject be more safely committed than to Congress, responsible always, as it is, to a constituency saturated with the traditions of liberty, jealous of any exercise of arbitrary or unwarranted power, and watchful to condemn carelessness or callousness in the exercise of power by their representatives? Indeed, it might be said that on almost every limitation of the Constitution little controversy could possibly arise, on account of the universal readiness to concede the largest measure of freedom and self-government. [Applause.]

It may be necessary, Mr. Chairman, to provide different tariff laws and commercial regulations from our own for these people, not for their oppression, but for their benefit and support, and for the enforcement of a commercial policy which will redound to their welfare and our own. It may be necessary for a time, until the habits of freedom and the elevating influences of education and the experienced blessings of law and order have fitted them for a better system, to establish a judicial system not strictly in accordance with those to which we have been accustomed (to be as rapidly as circumstances will admit brought into full harmony with our system), not to debase, but to improve and purify the quality of justice and mercy. It may be necessary to place certain restrictions upon their inhabitants, not for their oppression or degradation, but for their and our security and protection.

That the inhabitants of these islands shall enjoy every fundamental and inalienable right, such as protection by the Government, the enjoyment of life and liberty, and the right to the pursuit of happiness and to acquire and enjoy property, subject only to such restraints as may be prescribed for the public good, all of us are fully agreed. That they will, under our Government, come to a realization of blessings of which they have never even had a glimpse before I for one have not the slightest doubt. It could not possibly be otherwise under the government and control of a people in whom, as I have said in the beginning, these things are bred in the bone—a race and people liberty loving, liberty preserving, and liberty extending. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NEVILLE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas has not fifteen minutes to yield.

Mr. DINSMORE. I thought I had more than that.

Mr. HITT. I will yield to the gentleman from Arkansas fifteen minutes.

Mr. DINSMORE. My understanding was that the time to-day was to be equally divided between the two sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] yields fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE].

Mr. DINSMORE. Very well. I will yield that to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NEVILLE].

Mr. NEVILLE. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of this bill it is my purpose to dwell upon the policy of this country in relation to human rights, and especially those involved in imperialism attempted under the cloak of expansion.

The question as to the right and wisdom of this country entering upon a colonial policy is intensely political and has already reached the bitter state, yet there is a difference of opinion among members of each party, and I have no doubt an honest one, as to the duty of this country in the matter.

Variety of opinion is sure to exist where there is a variety of interest considered separate from their relation to justice and patriotism.

I belong to a party which believes that the declaration of principles upon which the American people passed from the condition of colonial dependencies to the enjoyment of human liberty and national greatness is still as sound as the day it was written.

It is a real consolation to believe in the common brotherhood of the human family; to believe that all men were created equal, or in other words, to believe that when God made man and woman as the source of human development, class distinction was not decreed.

In the consideration of human rights it is well to know that classes, royalty, kings, monarchs, subjects, lackeys, valets, serfs, tramps, and slaves are all attributes resulting from man-made law and rule of conduct.

Throughout all the ages liberty has cost eternal vigilance, and national greatness has been in proportion to the freedom of its people, resulting in the high intelligence of the average citizen, yet experience of freemen obtained by heroic efforts in the establishment of government is never inherited by the children of heroes.

History imparts to us a desire to become great and a patriotic love for the liberty we enjoy, but gives us no practical wisdom by which we can measure regard for the rights of others while such rights interfere with our apparent opportunities.

The proposition that "the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed" is as correct to-day as it was when American patriots hurled it in the teeth of King George, and the consent of the majority implies the right of all to participate. No government can claim the dignity of being a government by the people when a portion of its people are subjects not having equal rights before the law.

It is amazing to a Populist to hear members upon this side of the House declare in debate that "this is a white man's government," and justify a property and educational qualification to exclude the black man from the right of suffrage and at the same time denounce the Republican party for trying to govern the brown man without his consent.

I am one of those who believe that every American citizen has the right to work for whom he will and for such price as he deems just, and in addition thereto should have the right to participate in the framing of the law which shall control the collection of his pay.

Mr. Chairman, as a Populist, I am much more amazed to observe members upon the other side of this House dramatize indignation because a black man is occasionally deprived of life without due process of law, and in the same breath laud the Administration for shooting salvation and submission into the brown man because he wants to be free.

The prophet of Bagdad said, "Go with the sword and follow with the Koran, and he who will not accept my teachings smite him down." When we contrast with this doctrine the present American policy of "benevolent assimilation" we are led to wonder who the present Administration of this Government will ape next.

Nations should have the same right among nations that men have among men. The right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness is as dear to the black and brown man as to the white; as precious to the poor as to the rich; as just to the ignorant as to the educated; as sacred to the weak as to the strong, and as applicable to nations as to individuals, and the nation which subverts such right by force is no better governed than the man who takes the law in his own hands.

And it is a gratification to note that the liberty-loving people from all countries are flocking to the standard of the Boers, to help crush out that infamous doctrine that large nations have the right to subjugate small ones.

Aside from its relation to rectitude, what does a colonial policy mean to this country? The love of freedom is not easily obliterated after once having been sought by a human being. The standing army, when sufficiently large and biddable, may keep it in check, but never eradicate. Can the great American Republic afford to abandon civil government for militarism? Has the human family not yet realized that a large standing army is the bodyguard for kings and tyrants and is always a menace to the perpetuity of free institutions?

Only a few days ago a bill passed this House to establish a military post at Des Moines, Iowa; an innocent act of itself, yet the reason advanced by the Secretary of War for its necessity was a desire to locate the Army near the great centers of population; where many railway lines converge. I need not go into details, the humblest wage-earner in the land knows what this means.

A republic based upon a declaration of equality to all its citizens and operated by the consent of the majority of the people only needs sufficient soldiery to police and defend in emergency, but where a minority class seeks to throttle and hold the majority in subjection and slavery force is required, and the standing army is the most suggestive and the most potent. We need not tell the naturalized citizens who came from any of the provinces of European nations the effect of militarism. They know what a government by force means.

In the selection of a standing army only those physically and mentally sound are enlisted, and thus it is the greater the army the less the mental and physical average of those remaining to father the future generations.

Our Volunteer Army was sufficient to back our assertion of human rights in 1776. It was equal to the emergency in the war of 1812. It was all we needed in the war with Mexico. It saved the Union in the fiercest of all—the struggle between the States, North and South. It was the admiration of the world in the Spanish-American war, and in the war to subjugate the natives in the Philippine Islands the citizen soldiery of Nebraska, from a patriotic devotion to American valor, increased the record for human bravery without the incentive of a just cause.

The American flag as the emblem of liberty and protector of human rights has been hitherto followed by a patriotic devotion that knew no obstacle, because the American people firmly believed that it represented liberty, justice, and good government; and when the American flag rightly stands upon any spot of the earth as an evidence of sovereignty justly obtained the American citizen will defend its right to stand there, and all other nations will know enough to respect its purpose; but when the American flag is made to become a cloak for greed, avarice, and oppression, those who try to wrest it from such degrading tendencies care little for the yell "Traitor!" "Copperhead!"

We are willing that the British lion should have a monopoly of the policy of aggrandizement and expansion by subjugation and criminal aggression, but let us hope the day may never come when the American eagle will abandon the patriotism and humanity of a Washington and a Lincoln for the greed and avarice of a Napoleon and an Alexander or the brutality of a Tiberius and a Nero. Has it come to this in learned America, that the halting of a patriotic people must be goaded by such stirring words as "Who shall dare pull down the flag?" Humanity in pursuit of a just cause never needed a lash.

Was the flag never hauled down? There was a time when it waved over the City of Mexico as an evidence of supremacy, and the whole Mexican army lay vanquished at our feet. Who was it then said, "Who shall dare take it down?" That element of American citizenship who believed the Declaration of Independence did not apply to the black man said, "Let it stand;" it will make 7 more States, 14 new Senators, and the proportionate number of Congressmen to urge the doctrine that one man may own and operate another.

But the big-hearted advocates of human rights said, "Take it down; if left there it will stand for conquest and aggression against justice and liberty." Who were the "traitors" and "copperheads" then? I pause for a reply.

The venerable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] charges that our conduct makes the suppression of the Philippines cost $2 where $1 would otherwise suffice. In speaking solely for myself, Mr. Chairman, let it be distinctly understood that so long as I believe a proffer of freedom justly due would end hostility I will not cease trying to thwart inhumanity because of the cost to the butcher.

I pledged my constituents that if elected to Congress I would never vote one dollar of public money to help the Sultan of Sulu support 12 wives and 146 slaves; and while upon this branch of the subject I would be glad to have the members upon the other side of this House answer the following questions:

First. Does the Administration intend to permanently hold the Philippine Islands as American territory or colonies?

Second. If it does, or does not, does the Administration intend to recognize slavery and polygamy in Jolo so long as it holds the Philippines as United States territory or colonies?

Third. If the Administration intends to stamp out polygamy and slavery at some future time, was the concession for a present continuance thereof necessary to secure peaceable control?

Fourth. If the object of the Administration was to get peaceable control by binding this Government to support polygamy, slavery, and Mohammedanism, was the acquisition worth the cost?

Fifth. If the Administration did not intend to be bound, was the cunning and fraud up to the proper standard of American manhood in dealing with an ignorant and unsuspecting people?

But, Mr. Chairman, these are not all the complications. We have upon our statute books a law known as the Chinese-exclusion act, and some months ago General Otis, in an effort to enforce this law, refused to allow a shipload of Chinamen to land on the Philippine Islands. These people had mingled and intermarried for a thousand years. They were next-door neighbors. Their habits and customs were the same. They were akin by all the ties of brotherhood. What happened? China, after consulting with other powers, demanded an explanation of the United States, and what was the explanation? The Administration telegraphed Otis "to let them land," and word went out to the newspapers that it was disposed to relax the rigor of the exclusion act. Does the average citizen see the endless chain? Will it lead to American civilization in the Philippines or Mongolian equilibrium in America?

Who shall say that the people of an American colony may not mingle and trade in the master country? Shall Puerto Rico, as a Territory of the United States, be allowed a delegate familiar with her wants to represent her upon this floor with a view to ultimate statehood, or shall she be governed as a colony to augment that part of our possessions over which an American President may pose as an emperor?

Let me warn you, my Populist brethren, my Democratic friends, and conscientious Republicans all over the land, to weigh well the tendency of American domination under the cloak of Christian duty, industrial and commercial benefits.

You penetrated the hypocritical mask covering Republican financial intent only in time to discover you had slept upon your rights. Can you not now see the tendency of the Republican party to utilize the Army when sufficiently large, with the aid of armed assassins, to prevent by force a lawful transfer of the reins of government when the slightest pretense is available? [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RAY of New York having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2477. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Dubuque, Iowa;

S. 704. An act for the relief of the County of Custer, State of Montana;

S. 329. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Evanston, in the State of Wyoming; and

S. 26. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Nashua, in the State of New Hampshire.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 136) providing for the distribution of compiled statutes of the District of Columbia to committees of the Senate and House of Representatives; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 5076) to amend the first section of an act to change the time and places for the district and circuit courts of the northern district of Texas, approved June 11, 1896; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6073) to amend section 4 of the act of Congress approved June 16, 1880, granting to the city of Hot Springs, Ark., certain lands as a city park, and for other purposes.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas further time.

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] twenty minutes.

[Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration makes an appropriation for the consular and diplomatic service of our country. No more important measure will be presented for our consideration. Very little attention has thus far been given in debate to the specific provisions of the bill, the result of patient and laborious care on the part of the committee, and especially commendable to the distinguished and able chairman.

Many suggestions have been made by members of the committee and others during its preparation, looking to the improvement of the foreign service; and I have no doubt whatever, but for the rule which prevents new legislation on general appropriation bills, some of these suggestions might have met with favor.

Notice was given to the committee of my desire to incorporate a new provision in the bill authorizing a minister resident to the Orange Free State and the South African Republic, not for the purpose of adding to our perplexities, but because of the growing importance of our relations to those countries and the desire to afford to the President, whenever he might think proper, this wider latitude for diplomatic relationship.

Realizing the hostility of our committee to this plan in the present bill, and the fruitlessness of such an effort in the face of a single objection, which I am advised will be forthcoming, I have concluded not to press the matter in violation of the rules, with which every member is supposed to be familiar, but shall content myself by bringing in a bill in the usual and orderly way.

Mr. Chairman, much discussion has been going on in the public press and in Congress regarding our foreign affairs and much about the foreign affairs of other countries. It is not my purpose to traverse these well-worn paths, but to briefly point out the difficulties of our position and fix some of the responsibility therefor.

A very large and representative element in our country has placed itself in opposition to the annexation of new territory by the United States whenever it has been attempted in the past. There was much respectable opposition to the annexation of Louisiana, Texas, and that vast empire of the West now constituting a veritable bulwark of American States; opposition loud and demonstrative against the cherished idea of President Grant to make Santo Domingo a part of the American Union, when it was offered to our country merely for the asking and defeated out of pure spite by a tie vote in the Senate—that rich gem of the Caribbean Sea, the natural resting place and rendezvous of our West Indian fleet.

The distinguished representative of this Government in the Hawaiian Islands under the Administration of President Harrison, and at a critical juncture in the affairs of that Pacific territory, raised the American flag with the concurrence of the authorities of the Hawaiian group.

These islands had long been under the care and protection of our country. European powers understood that our interests were paramount there, and no other government regarded these islands as open to conquest. The attitude of our country was hailed with delight and satisfaction by the people there, and for the first time they felt themselves relieved from the doubt and anxiety of maintaining public order.

President Harrison promptly submitted a treaty of annexation to the Senate, but before it was acted upon the Administration changed. The Democratic party came into power; the treaty of annexation was withdrawn and a commissioner with paramount authority dispatched to these islands to connive and thwart the manifest purpose of his predecessor.

The country well remembers the unjustifiable conduct of the Democratic party at that time, and it disapproved this backward step. So soon as an opportunity was presented, the wrong done by Commissioner Blount was remedied, and these islands came legally, effectively, permanently within the legal limits of our sovereignty. [Applause.]

Were we wise in this action? Everyone now admits it. The danger of hostile attack upon our western coast has been reduced, and no foreign fleet hovers about this Pacific stronghold prepared to dash upon our coast at the slightest provocation.

The dream and hope and expectation of our statesmen, strategists, and sailors received its final consummation when annexation became an accomplished fact. Is there a man upon the other side of this Chamber who has the temerity to now rise in his place and say that he regrets the course pursued by the Republican party in this matter?

When the last revolution of the Cuban people was at its height; when they were entitled to belligerent rights under every rule of international law; when they had held at bay 200,000 soldiers, the flower of the Spanish army, and had driven back to Spain every prominent general who had been sent over for the purpose of accomplishing the pacification of the island; when they had maintained a separate government for upward of three years and the island was torn with war, devastated with fire and famine, and depopulated with disease and starvation from end to end; who was it that opposed their recognition as belligerents? Why, of course, it was a Democratic President, and his action was sustained for many months by his party in the Congress of the United States. The prayer of the struggling, the parched lips of the dying, the cry of distress from women and little children, were not heard until the Democratic party was retired from power and the Republican party installed in its place. [Applause.]

From what source does this wail of political opposition to the annexation of the Philippine Islands come? Who is it that finds most fault and is loudest in denunciation of our conduct? No less a personage than the late leader of the Democratic party in a fruitless Presidential contest, who, if my memory serves me right, was, if it be a crime, particeps criminis in our action in this regard, for he not only enlisted in the Army to put down the power of Spain, knowing that the fruits of war would dispossess her of her territory wherever it was the disposition of this Government to strike, but he could scarcely wait to be discharged before he posted off to Washington to advise the hesitating and halting Democrats in the United States Senate that they should ratify the Paris treaty of peace, which provided that the Philippine Archipelago, Puerto Rico, and the island of Guam should become part of the territory of the United States [applause], and providing also for the payment of the $20,000,000 agreed upon in this convention. How often since, with a brazenness and effrontery unequaled, has he berated the Government and its high officers for doing the very thing which he himself advised and to which he was a party?

From what source does this criticism come, I ask again, for our policy as to the Philippine Islands and Puerto Rico and Guam? It comes from the disorganized, disordered, distracted organization represented upon the other side of this Chamber, occasionally sprinkled with a few well-meaning but misguided and mischievous critics, who, having taken a wrong position, have not the courage to change it.

When the declaration of war was made with Spain it contained a proposition binding upon our Government a certain course of conduct with reference to the future government of Cuba. I regretted that condition then and I regret it now. From what source did that provision emanate? It was tacked on to the declaration in the Senate of the United States by a Populistic Senator as a mere sop to the jealous powers of Europe.

Who are they, Mr. Chairman, who have upon every occasion given aid and comfort to the enemies of our country in rebellion against the flag borne so bravely by Lawton and Logan and the soldiers of our Union in that far-off land? Democrats, Populists. Sir, they have criticised the President for not acting earlier in Cuba; have criticised the President for acting at all in the Philippines. We can not satisfy them. They urged us to war with Spain before the country was ready, and want us to stop before we are through. The Democratic party were eager for our soldiers to go into Cuba and, lo and behold, are as eager for them to get out. You are a party of negation, fault-finding, demagogy, and demoralization. You complain of the treaty of peace, ratified under the whip and spur of public opinion, many Democrats being forced to vote therefor; and now, with sublime impudence, you arise here upon every occasion to find fault with us for occupying the ceded territory. Consistency, thou art a jewel, but indeed rare upon the other side of this Chamber. [Applause.]

Complaining of our embroilment in the affairs of the far east, to which point you say we have unlawfully stretched the Constitution, you now seek to involve our country in the affairs of the South African Republic. Can we safely be governed by their advice? When has it been wise and helpful? I pause for a reply, and "the only answer is the echo of your wailing cry."

You accuse us of making an alliance with England. What for? The occasion does not exist, and the desire is not present in the heart or mind of any worthy public official. The charge is baseless, unworthy its authors, and intended merely as a cheap scarecrow to alarm timid people.

The only alliance known to me between England and the United States was dissolved yesterday by mutual agreement. It was made before the Republican party was born, and is known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, providing for the joint use and occupation of a canal across the Isthmus. It was an ill-gotten child and nobody regrets its demise.

Alliance with England! Intangible, indefinite, indistinct hallucination, born in the small brain of a distorted demagogue for political purposes in this campaign only! [Applause.]

For several weeks past the tender sympathies of the American people have been aroused and their interest excited in the unjustifiable war now being waged by England in South Africa. Public meetings have been held, resolutions of sympathy adopted, and funds raised to ameliorate suffering and distress—all commendable, praiseworthy manifestations of the federation of mankind and humanity's interest in humanity, though seas divide and continents separate. [Applause.]

Demonstrations of this character are cosmopolitan, embracing Americans, native and foreign born, but whether of Dutch, German, Irish, Scandinavian, or Polish descent, they vie equally with one another in upholding the right and condemning the wrong. Their love of liberty may have been born in the throes of revolution. The ax of the Duke of Alva may have been made crimson with the blood of ancestors spotless in the sight of heaven, or their native soil despoiled and they driven forth into the world without a country, save, perhaps, this God-given land of their adoption where the bright bow of promise lured them. Emigrants though they were, they have been true and loyal to the country through storm and trial.

I have the honor to represent upon this floor more Holland-Americans than any member here. They are among the best citizens of our Commonwealth. Honest, sturdy, self-reliant, frugal, they plod the weary path of life with hope as their guiding star and faith in the life to come.

Sirs, I would consider myself unworthy to represent them here if for a moment I yielded to the precipitate pressure of the overzealous or did any act that might in its consequences place our country in a false light in the eyes of the world, involve the destruction of the salutary doctrine enunciated by Monroe, or lessen the feeling of security now enjoyed by all classes of our citizenship. A man in the private walks of life is responsible only to his conscience—may give expression to his feelings unrestrained—but those charged with official responsibility must never forget that no matter how many are pro-English or pro-Boer, it is his bounden duty under the Constitution he has sworn to uphold to be openly, avowedly, loyally pro-American. [Applause.]

Gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber mistake the character of those sympathizing with the Boer and underestimate their love of liberty and devotion to America if they think these sturdy men would for an instant imperil our institutions or impair the security of our homes, the peace of our firesides, or cast discredit upon our Government by any hasty, unwise, unlawful, or premature act.

Yesterday upon this floor, in the heat of debate, a distinguished and able Representative, after detailing the conquests of England, expressed the wish that this last war in South Africa might work the beginning of the end of the British Empire. Shame! Shame! Would you welcome the fall of a vast empire, bringing wreck and ruin upon the millions of peasants and yeomanry who are only temporarily represented by a foreign secretary, bent upon his present unholy mission? Far, far more preferable be it said that Joseph Chamberlain misinterprets the will of the English people. Public sentiment does not sustain him at home, and the wide, wide world is encircled with disapproval.

The ministry overstepped when they undertook to interfere in the domestic affairs of the South African Republic. I need not go to the other side of this Chamber for witnesses. I can summon to the bar of public opinion many of the foremost statesmen of England. Take, for example, the uncontradicted statements of James Brice, W. T. Stead, of Sir William Vernon-Harcourt, the great Liberal leader of England and formerly in the cabinet of Gladstone, who says:

That convention as it was called, of 1881, reserved to Great Britain the right of veto upon treaties with foreign states. Secondly, in regard to its internal administration, it limited, in a certain degree, the internal government and autonomy of the Transvaal State, but as Lord Derby, who was then colonial secretary, stated (I give his words), "In all other respects entire freedom of action was accorded not inconsistent with the rights expressly reserved," so that in the convention of 1881—follow me here—it was in that first convention of 1881 the independence so limited was expressed by the word suzerainty, a vague word, but one which was employed in that convention of 1881.

Then as for the new convention. You have a convention in which the word "suzerainty" has disappeared. You have a reservation of the control of this country over the treaty relations of the Transvaal, and what was the result of that new convention? The result of that new convention was stated by Lord Derby; and now this is a very important statement. He said:

"By the omission of those articles in the convention of 1881, which assigned to Her Majesty and the British Government certain specific powers and functions connected with the internal government and the foreign relations, your Government will be left free to govern the country without interference, to conduct its diplomatic intercourse and shape its foreign policy, subject only to the requirements embodied in the fourth article of the new draft that any treaty with a foreign state shall not have effect without the approval of the Queen."

Therefore, I think you may take it with absolute certainty that the new convention of 1884 was this: It kept the control of foreign affairs under the veto of the British Government, and in respect of their internal affairs struck out the word "suzerainty," leaving or giving to the people of the Transvaal absolute internal authority—home rule, in fact, for themselves.

Why should we copy an old preamble in a new convention? In the preamble of 1884 the word "suzerainty" disappears, and it is not found in any of the articles of that convention. This may seem rather technical to you, but it really lies at the bottom of what is at issue to-day. * * *

Mr. W. H. Smith, who was the respected leader of the House of Commons, as the representative of that Government, said:

"The convention of London made in 1884 between Her Majesty and the South African Republic contains no express reservation of the Queen's right of suzerainty; and though Her Majesty retains under the convention the power of refusing to sanction the treaties made by the South African Republic with foreign states and nations and with certain native tribes, the cardinal principle of that settlement [mark this] was that the internal government and legislation of the South African Republic shall not be interfered with. What is the use of talking of the existing of suzerainty over their international affairs reserved in the preamble of the convention of 1881 which was done away with by the convention of 1884?"

Clearly no legal right existed in Great Britain to regulate the suffrage laws and fix new qualifications for electors. This was a domestic affair, to be regulated by the Government of the Transvaal.

In his dispatch of December 31, 1895, Mr. Chamberlain defined the South African Republic as "a foreign State which is in friendly treaty relations with Great Britain."

Again, on May 8, 1896, he said in the House of Commons:

To go to war with President Kruger in order to force upon him reform in internal affairs of his State, in which secretaries of state, standing in this place, have repudiated all right of interference—that would be a course of action as immoral as it would be unwise.

To whom shall he now answer for this deplorable war, with its fearful loss of life? To high heaven and his country and mankind. Once aroused, the common sense of England will hurl him from his high office and, following the example of Gladstone, "whose wisdom still rules us from its urn," will halt her troops, wherever scattered, and bid them return to the constitutional and legal limits of her lawful domain.

Gentlemen upon the other side have upon the rostrum and in this presence said it was our duty to interfere. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] says it is our duty to offer mediation. Mr. Chairman, such doctrine is unknown in the law of nations, and such course upon our part would properly subject us to the charge of unwarranted meddlesomeness. We do not know that our offer would be acceptable to either party. The Boers, who have shown a disposition to take care of themselves, have not asked us to interfere, while Great Britain bears her defeats without complaining. Where does our duty lie?

Much as we deplore war, sincerely as we would welcome peace, the war is not of our making and our sympathies must not be permitted to involve us.

While Secretary, Daniel Webster thus wrote to the President in 1852, as follows:

It has never been the purpose of the Government of the United States to interpose, directly or indirectly, in the affairs of the States of Central America, with a view to settle the controversies between them by any influence whatsoever exercised by this Government without their request or free consent.

Mr. Everett, Secretary of State, in writing to Sir Edward Thornton, the British minister, in September, 1879, apropos of the proposition to join with Great Britain and Germany in offering their mediation in the war then pending between Chili and Peru, made the following statement:

I am able to say, however, that our ministers have given and are giving attention to the wishes of this Government to procure its good offices in favor of peace at the earliest indication of the readiness of the belligerents to consider such good offices acceptable.

Our course is plain. We must await events or expose our own country to criticism and possibly obloquy. The Boers in South Africa seem amply able to take care of themselves. [Applause.] And I hope and trust that no false sentimentality will prompt our country to enter upon any other course than will be creditable to it now and in the future. I would not have England crush the Boers; neither do I wish for England calamity within her proper and legitimate domain, and I do not believe the most ultra pro-Boer in the United States wishes any such destiny for that great Empire across the sea.

Why, Mr. Chairman, what does it mean? It means that the policy of the colonial secretary, Mr. Chamberlain, is to bring down upon the heads of the common people of England the failure and fall of their country and their Government. Any man or party or set of men who would wish such an end for the British Empire is thoughtless indeed. Are you talking for mere party advantage? How unjustifiable. Who constitutes the British Empire? Not Sir Joseph Chamberlain alone, but Sir William Vernon Harcourt as well and those whom he represents as the great leader of so many thousands of Liberals who oppose and think unwise the policy of Mr. Chamberlain in this crisis.

Why, Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] bring down ruin upon the common people of England? Great in her history, great in her sober, steady yeomanry, it is not the mere temporary representative in power, but it is the common people behind that representative, for whom I speak; and much as my sympathies go out to the Boers, much as I believe England to be wrong in this controversy, much as I believe that history will hold her forever the unlawful aggressor in the field of her present military operations, still I do wish for England honor, fame, and renown as a country, because I believe in the ultimate glorious destiny of the Anglo-Saxon race.

Mr. Chairman, I am well aware of the fact that the President has been urged again and again to mediate in this controversy. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] holds that he has this power of mediation at any time. A close reading of international law throws doubt upon this proposition. Indeed, if he goes according to the rule of nations, he must wait until one of the parties to the contest or both of them ask him to mediate or intervene.

I find in this resolution which I hold in my hand, passed by over 4,000 citizens of my home city at Grand Rapids, at a pro-Boer meeting, sympathizing strongly, as does every lover of liberty the world over, with the Boers—I find in the closing paragraph of this arraignment of Great Britain and her course a provision that the President shall be requested to mediate and offer his good offices "whenever it may be done within the rules of international law," and I am ready to await the action of the President. I am eager to follow in his lead. He can be trusted to do what is right, both for our country and for others, should they ask mediation.

Many of us recall how we urged the President to take early action with reference to Cuba. Committees were appointed from this House to wait upon him and urge him that civilization and the people of the country wanted him to act. But he waited, with thoughtful hesitation, not wishing to be rushed unduly into a scene the end of which no man could foretell. And I recall how, sitting around his Cabinet table one day, members of this House urged him to act promptly and vigorously.

I know one gentleman, now in my hearing, who said to him, "Mr. President, those torpedo boats are upon the high sea. They will soon menace our harbors. We must have protection for our coast cities. We think it is time for you to act." I recall the reply, as do others sitting near me, when the President said, "You ask me to act. You say you are afraid of the torpedo boats now upon the sea and headed for our country. Give yourself no uneasiness, sir. While I do not propose to go to war if it can be avoided, while I pray to God that we may be absolved from this terrible thing—I know what war is—while I shall not shrink from it if it comes, but would be saved from it if possible, if those torpedo boats come to our country our American Navy will take care of them, sir. Give yourself no uneasiness upon that point." [Applause.]

And so they did; and I recall with what splendid composure the President awaited the final outcome, while many were criticising him. Indeed, in some sections of the country he was hung in effigy. In the theaters his name was hissed; but splendidly, superbly, with great composure, he stood at the helm in the midst of the storm and awaited the final outcome. And when the time came to act, he acted in harmony with that judgment of which he alone seems to be capable, and met every situation that confronted the country with matchless tact and great ability, which covered our country with glory and imperishable renown. [Applause.] That we were wiser in his leadership than we should have been without it everyone now concedes. That he was supremely right and met the full measure of his responsibility all admit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in this exigency, when he is asked to intervene, when he is asked to mediate, when he is asked to take action, shall we await the ripened judgment of his splendid mind, equal to every emergency, or shall we unduly force him when it is unnecessary? For my part, I am willing to follow the President.

If he ever sees the time when he thinks it will be appropriate to intervene, so may it be; but until that time comes I do not believe there is a single citizen of my district or State, I do not believe there is a single person in the United States, who, down deep in his heart, would have the President act otherwise than according to his own best judgment. He has led the country through many a perilous period. He will do it again. Thank God, I have never yet in the course of my life felt called upon to criticise in severe or harsh language any President of the United States. My respect for that high office prompts me to pause, and my respect for its present occupant would not permit severe criticism or abuse to be hurled at him without making an attempt in his defense.

He is our President, no matter what political party puts him in power. He is the President of the whole people; and it ill becomes any citizen of the country to abuse him without cause. [Applause on the Republican side.] The burden of the President of the United States is heavy enough without our adding greater or more onerous ones for him to carry. The people of my district do not desire to embarrass the President, and our Democratic friends on the other side should not do so merely to meet the requirements of political exigencies. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, why do not our Democratic opponents criticise something in the Administration of President McKinley at home? Not a single word of criticism upon the tariff law, which a special session of Congress put upon the statute books, reviving industry and giving employment to labor; not a single criticism about any of our internal affairs chargeable to the President. Instead, they carry us far out into the Pacific and to the Sulu Islands.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The farther away their inquiry is directed the better the excuse for heaping opprobrium upon the President and his party.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand you are ready to follow the President on the questions of the day. I want to ask the gentleman if he is going with him in recommending free trade for Puerto Rico, or is he going to vote to tax them at 25 per cent?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then you will not go with the President.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; I am with the President, and follow his leadership, because I believe it inspired by the highest wisdom and loftiest patriotism.

Mr. RICHARDSON. He has recommended free trade, and the committee recommend 25 per cent tax. Are you going to vote for that, or are you going to vote for free trade and be with the President?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am going to stand with the President.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is all right.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH (continuing). The leader of our party and the embodiment of more wisdom than will ever be gathered up from all the cohorts of the Democracy of the North, East, South, or West. [Applause on the Republican side and in the galleries.]

The CHAIRMAN. Applause in the galleries is not permissible.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am glad the gentleman is with us in that.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I reassert that they have not made a criticism upon our domestic affairs upon which they dare to go to the country in the next Presidential election. They know that factories have been opened as well as the mints. They know that the country is prosperous. We know it. From every State represented on the other side of this Chamber the uncontradicted testimony comes, while the great industries of my home city were never more prosperous.

Twice a year the buyers of furniture throughout the United States make their way to the city of Grand Rapids. In the past, 300 buyers, representing as many cities, filled the measure of our realization; but this year, this great year of Republican prosperity, over 800 buyers, from States represented on the other side of the Chamber as well as this, have gone there to buy the handiwork of our genius. [Applause.]

You can not stop this march of progress; you can not cripple the prosperity of our land. You know that your efforts are futile, and so you perch yourselves upon a very lofty plane and criticise our policy in the farthest nook of the world with which we may possibly have some temporary relation.

No, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party will never succeed by misrepresentations. The country is too wise; it knows their methods; it knows the results of their government, and they will avoid you as surely as the time comes to test our strength. Will they nominate for President their last and only leader? Will he say that the annexation or attempted annexation in the Philippine Islands was unwise, when he fought to obtain this identical conquest? He advocated the payment of this money and he advocated the ratification of the treaty which meant the annexation of these islands. Will he go to the country upon a platform that he was or is opposed to that policy? The country will see through his sham.

No, Mr. Chairman, this is too great a country for small evasions. The people are too sincere and devoted to it to be trifled with. Our struggles are our chaplets woven in the woof of history. Mankind the world over shares in our triumphs. Where we think and act, and by action change into reality the dreams of optimists who love their fellows; where by suffering we wring from defeat the glories of victory, it seems to the listening nations of an awakened world that our heroic efforts are glorified and graced by the approval of heaven itself and redound to the benefit of the whole human race, and the spectacle is shown of the Giant of the West, with burnished shield and drawn sword, standing in the midst of the nations of earth as the champion of the oppressed, the defender of the weak, and the acknowledged arbiter of the eternal right.

It was once said of the resurrection of Greece and the cession by Great Britain of Crete, Thessaly, Epirus, and the Ionian Isles, "Thus did the old Hellas arise from the grave of nations; scorched by fire, riddled by shot, baptized by blood, she emerged victorious from the conflict. She achieved her independence because she proved herself worthy of it. She was trained to manhood in the only school of real improvement—the school of suffering." Thus our country was born, cradled, and reared, and for the incarnation of this mighty spirit I follow willingly and gladly the matchless leadership of William McKinley, President of an indissoluble and united country. [Great applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PAYNE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6237) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HENRY C. SMITH].

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I was prompted by an article in the Washington Post, of this city, to say something on this occasion.

THE VOICE OF CHAMBERLAIN—EMPIRE'S SAFETY DEMANDS EXTINCTION OF REPUBLICS.

Mr. Chamberlain further declares that the war was just, necessary, and righteous. * * *

"Speaking for the Government, there will be no second Majuba. Never again shall the Boers erect in the heart of South Africa a citadel whence to proceed to disaffection and race animosity. Never again shall they be allowed to endanger the paramountcy of Great Britain. Never again shall they be able to treat an Englishman as though he belonged to an inferior race."

Through that article—and I hope there will be no want of harmony among the Smiths, especially of our State [laughter]—I find that this same Sir William Harcourt contended that though the war was an unhappy business, it must be fought out to the bitter end. Bitterness does not go with justice. Justice is tempered with mercy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, I am in harmony with my brother from the northern part of my State in saying that the sympathy of our country ought to be extended to these brave people in the southern Republic, in whose affairs I believe a parallel can be traced between their rights, their course, and their progress and the early struggles of the American Republic.

It seems to me that the parallel might be complete if we should assume that these Germans, like the Germans everywhere, had sought only a home, peace, education, and prosperity. Suppose in the early days England had had the strength and the right and had had the justice to have conquered us when we were colonies, and suppose we had declined to submit to live under the domination and the tyranny of that Empire, which it exerts everywhere it has ever placed its hand; and suppose we had moved, for instance, to the State of Texas, and we had there builded ourselves homes; we had there carved out farms; we had there raised our children, and we were happy and peaceable and contented, pursuing education and advancement in culture and civilization, and that England had marched on and had taken possession of our farms and little homes and had driven us from them.

Suppose we had peaceably surrendered those homes and what we had, and had gone on, say to Missouri or Minnesota—and the distance is about the same—and had there carved out new homes and had started again to rear families, to have an education, to have peace and have quiet, and the English had discovered that in this new land of ours there was gold. If in this new land of ours there were diamond fields; and if they had come to ask us to move on, to leave those homes and those diamond fields, would we not have fought to maintain them?

For one I want to say that in my State the civilization that we have, the advancement that we have made, the progress we have attained we owe largely to the splendid, progressive, and honest German blood. I believe that it will grow stronger with time; and I believe that if we are to tie up to any power, we ought not to tie up to the decaying power of England, but we ought to tie up to the progressive, the strong, the growing blood of the German Empire.

The article in the Post further states:

The prowess of British arms has long been a factor in the Empire's world influence. England has commanded obedience, if not respect, by sheer brute force. But with her troops making as pitiable a showing against the Boers as China made against Japan, the hereditary enemies of Great Britain will find new courage. The entire press of Europe, reflecting the sentiment of the masses of the people, which official diplomacy or conservatism can not stifle, is rejoicing in the defeats of the British. A single spark may ignite these inflammable elements. Intervention is probable; and if England, savage over her humiliating showing, refuses to accept the suggestion, what more natural than that her opponents should turn upon and rend her?

And if it should come to pass that this unholy war against the Boers should result in the dismemberment of the British Empire, what a triumph of retributive justice it would be! There can be little genuine sympathy for England anywhere. She has ever been an oppressor, a slaughterer of savages, a crusher of the weak, the most relentless of masters.

The Boers, fighting for their homes and their freedom, have the admiration of the world. They may lose the unequal battle, for England's millions of men and money must eventually triumph, but the struggle will write an indelible page in the bloody history of British greed and injustice.

Mr. SIMS. Why do not the SMITHS from Michigan introduce a resolution expressive of our sentiments on this subject?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I supposed that the other SMITH from our State would do it; otherwise I should have done so. [Laughter.]

Mr. HITT. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 6. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to use $60,000 of the appropriation for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, for the construction of a modern hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.;

H. R. 947. An act to create a new division in the eastern judicial district of the State of Tennessee;

MAP OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 67) providing for the mounting and distribution of United States maps, to report it with a substitute for the original joint resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was, to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That all maps of the United States published by the General Land Office shall, before distribution, be mounted on sticks, ready for use, by the Department of the Interior, and shall be distributed by the Secretary thereof, those published for the use of Congress only upon the orders of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates. Duplication in their distribution shall be prevented, and in all cases recipients shall be informed upon whose order the map is supplied.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from New York, the chairman of the committee, if this publication includes a map which the newspapers have been announcing for several months would be published, containing a map and description of the islands?

Mr. PLATT of New York. I think so.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unfortunately the announcement went out from the Interior Department that such a map was in preparation, and we have been flooded with applications for it when it does not exist. I shall be gratified to know that it is about to be published; but I should like to have the Senator certain that this is that map.

Mr. PLATT of New York. It is the map that is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is all very true. We have been publishing maps recommended by him; but I refer to a map including the new islands—our island possessions, as they are called. That map, it has been reported, was being prepared in the office, and we have been getting applications for it for a long time. I should like to know if it is that map that this resolution authorizes to be published.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I can not state positively as to that. It is the map prepared by the Interior Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, we have published seven, eight, or ten different editions of that map. I suppose this is the regular map of 1898 or 1899. I take it for granted that it is; and I hope there will be no applications for it under the name of the new map that was to be issued, with the islands described on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported as a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom the subject was referred, to report an original joint resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 83) increasing the limit of cost of the new building for the Government Printing Office, to meet the increased prices of building materials, and to permit of making the south end of the power-house extension of the same height as the main building, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the limit of cost of the new building for the Government Printing Office, authorized by the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1899, be, and hereby is, increased by $429,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to meet the increased prices of building materials and to permit of making the south end of the power-house extension, for a depth of about 45 feet from G street NW., of the same height as the main building.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PIUTE WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2385) for the settlement of Piute war claims, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 2385) entitled "A bill for the settlement of Piute war claims," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

ROBERT ADGER AND OTHERS.

Mr. McLAURIN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2688) for the relief of Robert Adger and others, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 2688) entitled "A bill for the relief of Robert Adger and others," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that those two resolutions, the one reported by the Senator from Nevada and the one reported by the Senator from South Carolina, may be printed, so that we can have them and see what has been done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be printed.

ESTATE OF PAUL M'NEEL, DECEASED.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1259) for the relief of the legal representatives of Paul McNeel, deceased, of Pocahontas County, W. Va., reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 1259) entitled "A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Paul McNeel, deceased, of Pocahontas County, W. Va.," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

Add at the end of section 7 the following:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be prepared Treasury notes to the amount of $200,000,000, said notes to be in such form and denomination as the Secretary may determine, and to be full legal tender for all debts, public and private. The Secretary shall cause to be engraved upon each of said notes the words 'bond note' and the statement that said note is a full legal tender, as aforesaid; and he shall loan, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, said notes to any person, persons, or corporation in sums not less than $100 on their depositing in the United States Treasury at par value and in sums equal to the amount of bond Treasury notes issued to such applicant or applicants; said bond Treasury notes so issued shall bear the same rate of interest as the bonds upon which they are issued, and said bonds so deposited with the Treasury shall only be redeemed by the original depositors of the same or their assigns by surrendering to the Treasury bond Treasury notes or other legal-tender money of the United States of equal amount with the par value of said bonds and accrued interest."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

PUBLIC-SCHOOL STUDIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STEWART. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be directed to inform the Senate what course of studies is prescribed for the public schools of the District, and whether a thorough instruction in spelling, reading, writing, grammar, arithmetic, and geography supersede teaching of the higher branches of learning; and if not, why not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I perhaps am not well informed about this matter; but I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada whether the Commissioners of the District of Columbia prescribe the curriculum for our public schools?

Mr. STEWART. They will have some knowledge on that subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me that that is asking something the Commissioners really have nothing whatever to do with. I think perhaps if the Senator would send the resolution to the Committee on the District of Columbia for investigation he might reach the result he desires.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the Senator will excuse me, is there not a superintendent of schools here?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. Would he not have some direction of these matters?

Mr. GALLINGER. Unquestionably.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let the inquiry be directed to him, then.

Mr. ALLISON. The board of trustees, I think, has control over the schools of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Then let the inquiry be directed to the board of trustees. I think that would be better. I will change the resolution so as to direct it to the board of trustees.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that he adopt the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; let it go to the committee.

Mr. HOAR. Let him direct the Committee on the District of Columbia to inquire into the condition of primary education in the District of Columbia and report to us.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that course is better.

Mr. STEWART. I accept that suggestion. Let it be a resolution of inquiry directing the Committee on the District of Columbia to make inquiry and report to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will require an amendment to it.

Mr. STEWART. I will offer the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Perhaps the Senator had better withdraw the resolution and present it later in an amended form.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions?

Mr. STEWART subsequently submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia is hereby directed to make inquiry and inform the Senate what course of studies is prescribed for the public schools of the District, and whether a thorough instruction in spelling, reading, writing, grammar, arithmetic, and geography supersede teaching of the higher branches of learning; and if not, why not.

SOUTH CAROLINA STATE CLAIMS.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to examine the account between the United States and the State of South Carolina growing out of the claim for moneys expended by said State for military purposes in the Florida war of 1836 and 1837, and to report to the Senate of the United States as follows:

First. What amount was paid said State by the United States on said claim, stating date of payments, and under what acts of Congress said payments were made.

Second. What amount of interest was paid said State by the United States on said claims. If no interest was paid, what amount would be due said State on June 30, 1901. In the computation of interest applying the following rules, to wit:

"Interest shall be calculated up to the time of any payment made. To this interest the payment shall be first applied, and if it exceeds the interest due, the balance shall be applied to diminish the principal; if the payment falls short of the interest, the balance of interest shall not be added to the principal so as to produce interest."

NEUTRALITY IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. PENROSE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas commercial relations have been established and maintained for many years between the United States and Portugal in the Portugese East African possessions; and

Whereas a state of warfare exists between Great Britain and the Republics of South Africa in the territory contiguous to these possessions; and

Whereas there is entailed on the United States the duty of maintaining a strict neutrality between the belligerent nations while maintaining her commercial rights in those possessions; and

Whereas the United States is without any naval force there to maintain her obligations to Great Britain and the South African Republics as belligerents while maintaining her commercial rights with Portugal as neutral nations: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to detail from any of our squadrons, here or abroad, such and so many vessels as in his judgment may be necessary to effect these purposes.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. PENROSE. The bill (S. 2947) to indemnify the State of Pennsylvania for money expended in 1864 for militia called into the military service by the governor under the proclamation of the President of June 15, 1863, introduced by me, was improperly referred to the Committee on Claims. I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TURNER. On the 20th of December, 1899, I introduced a bill (S. 1941) for the relief of the Lower band of the Chinook Indians of the State of Washington, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims. I find that such bills are being referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, on the 31st of January the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], in the course of his speech on the Philippine question, made the following remarks in reference to the president of the Philippine Commission, President Schurman, of Cornell University. He said:

Mr. Schurman, in his Chicago interview (and this is the only authority I will read which is not vouched for by official documents) August 20, 1899, said:

[President Schurman, Chicago interview, August 20, 1899.]

General Aguinaldo is believed on the island to be honest, and I think that he is acting honestly in money matters, but whether from moral or political reasons I would not say.—Oriental American, page 99.

The fact of the matter is that he tried to bribe the insurgents, as near as we can ascertain, and failed; they would not take gold for peace.

This speech of the Senator from South Dakota was brought to the attention of the president of Cornell, and I have from him the following letter, which I will read. I do it for the purpose of having the RECORD corrected by his statement:

CORNELL UNIVERSITY, OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Ithaca, N. Y., February 3, 1900.

DEAR SENATOR DEPEW: I see, from page 1362 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that Senator PETTIGREW, speaking of myself, says:

"The fact of the matter is that he tried to bribe the insurgents, as near as we can ascertain, and failed; but they would not take gold for peace."

Had this preposterous statement been made anywhere else I should not have paid any attention to it; but as it has been made in the Senate of the United States, I desire to say to you that it is absolutely without foundation.

Very truly, yours,

J. G. SCHURMAN.

Hon. CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Now, Mr. President, at the time this speech was being made President Schurman was in this city upon business connected with his report and the report of his commission on the Philippine matter. He was at that very hour in conference with the President at the White House, and therefore competent to be summoned.

It seems to me that the alleged facts which have been brought forward by my friend the Senator from South Dakota in order to substantiate his contention that the President of the United States is a tyrant and that Aguinaldo is a patriot fail in the important consideration that his alleged facts never turn out to be true.

He has summoned the two witnesses who were more competent than any others to testify on the question of the original understanding had with Aguinaldo and of the position of the Philippine people, one Admiral Dewey and the other President Schurman, the president of the Philippine Commission.

Any evidence, any statement, in regard to this matter made by Admiral Dewey would be received at once by the people of the United States without further question, and the same can be said of any statement made by the president of Cornell University.

But instead of presenting his evidence by calling the witnesses themselves, he calls others for the purpose of proving what they have said.

With Admiral Dewey here in the city, his house well known, himself the most accessible of men, he reads, as proving what Admiral Dewey has said and what his position is, an alleged proclamation of Aguinaldo, translated by an unknown translator and published without any certificate of its authenticity in a New England newspaper; and instead of ascertaining, when President Schurman is in the city, what his views really are and what he really did say and what he really did do, he reads a report of an anonymous interview with an anonymous and unknown reporter in a Chicago newspaper. Admiral Dewey at once branded the statement affecting him as absolutely and unqualifiedly false, and now President Schurman repudiates the testimony attributed to him.

I submit, Mr. President, that having amid the mass of newspaper reports, of anonymous remarks, of testimony of no consideration and no value, subpœnaed the two greatest and most prominent witnesses in the country, he has done it in a way which discredits all the alleged facts which are presented on his side or the contention which Senator PETTIGREW and his friends endeavor to make in behalf of Aguinaldo and in discredit of the President and of the Philippine policy of the Administration.

These facts, or alleged facts, cited by the Senator from South Dakota, are like the army of Aguinaldo. Whenever the United States troops appear, there is no army of Aguinaldo. And whenever the truth is let in, as Admiral Dewey and President Schurman let it in, these alleged facts vanish in thin air. The basis of their whole contention has no better foundation than the seat of the Aguinaldo government, which, as far as I can ascertain, is nowhere except in the hat of Aguinaldo.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I suppose this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is, if it proceeds at all.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to reply very briefly to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, if it were not for the debate proceeding by unanimous consent, I should be very glad to go fully into the question with regard to the letters of Admiral Dewey. Under the circumstances I will simply reply briefly to the statement of Mr. Schurman and the letter of Admiral Dewey.

Mr. Schurman was chairman of the Philippine Commission. We received from him a brief report previous to the election. We have got part of another one now. It was well understood throughout the United States that we offered a sum in money for rifles if the insurgents would surrender them. It is well understood that we got no rifles, because they would not surrender them for gold. Occasionally a gun was delivered, when it was found afterwards that they were guns which had been captured, that were carried and surrendered by Filipinos who had been hired by some of our soldiers to do it.

What is more, Mr. President, the report went out throughout this country that our peace commissioners offered Aguinaldo a position equal to $5,000 a year and were unable to secure his services.

Now, have we been trying to get the facts? I introduced a resolution asking for facts two months ago, and no reply comes. We were told all summer that this was a matter for Congress to dispose of, and when Congress meets the facts are withheld. Not only are the facts withheld, but what are sent to us are garbled facts, not a full, fair statement of the whole question, as in duty bound the Executive should have done; not all the truth, but a portion of it, is sent to us.

I charge, Mr. President, that we attacked an ally; I charge that we have made an alliance with slavery; and the answer from Mr. Schurman is that it is not true that he offered Aguinaldo gold. I do not suppose Schurman saw Aguinaldo; but that the offer was made with his consent there can be no question.

The answer of Admiral Dewey is that he did make an alliance with the insurgents. Admiral Dewey says, referring to Aguinaldo:

I never promised him, directly or indirectly, independence for the Filipinos. I never treated him as an ally, except so far as to make use of him and his soldiers to assist me in my operations against the Spaniards. He never uttered the word "independence" in any conversation with me or my officers. The statement that I received him with military honors or saluted the Filipino flag is absolutely false.

Sincerely, yours,

GEORGE DEWEY.

Well, what is an "ally" if it is not an assistant against a common foe?

I simply want to read one brief extract from Lieut. Carlos G. Calkins, of the United States Navy, published in the June volume of the Proceedings of the United States Naval Institute. Touching the relations with the insurgents after the battle, the author says:

The Raleigh and Concord were sent to Subig Bay, where they effected the capture of Isla Grande, and turned the place over to the Filipinos, along with the troops and naval officers composing the garrison. This was the nearest approach to a direct alliance during the campaign.

They marched together. Aguinaldo's ships and sailors and our ships and sailors made a joint attack on Subig Bay, and, having captured the garrison, turned the troops and the garrison over to Aguinaldo's forces. If that was not an alliance as plain and distinct as it is possible to make one, then certainly the English language is at fault, for there is not a dictionary in our tongue which does not define such acts as an absolute alliance.

With regard to the word "independence," Aguinaldo scarcely ever used any other phrase. Here is a telegram dated Hongkong, July 22, 1898:

HONGKONG, July 22, 1898.

SECRETARY OF THE NAVY, Washington:

The following is for the Secretary of War:

"Aguinaldo declares dictator(ship) and martial law over all islands. The people expect independence. Recommend China ponies.

"ANDERSON, Commanding."

DEWEY.

That was on the 22d of July, 1898, and I read from the Report of the Secretary of the Navy, volume 2, page 117.

Mr. President, it is exceedingly unfortunate, it seems to me, that Admiral Dewey ever wrote this letter, and that it was unfortunate was evidently comprehended by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], for when he first used the letter he only read a portion of it, not reading the damaging statement which declares that there was an alliance. Afterwards the debate brought out the whole letter. Admiral Dewey's reports to the Navy Department show that independence was expected and relied upon.

On July 17, 1898, Admiral Dewey forwarded a decree issued by Aguinaldo to the Filipino people, with the following indorsement:

U. S. FLAGSHIP OLYMPIA, Cavite, July 17, 1898.

Respectfully forwarded for the information of the Department.

GEORGE DEWEY,
Rear-Admiral, U. S. N.,
Commanding United States Naval Force on Asiatic Station.

The decree by Aguinaldo to the people of the Philippines reads as follows:

To the people of the Philippines:

Acts of Providence have placed me in a position for which I can not but recognize my natural inefficiency; but as I have no right to violate the laws of Providence, nor to decline the duties which honor and patriotism impose upon me, I greet you, my beloved people, from that position.

In the face of the whole world I have proclaimed that the aspiration of my whole life, the final object of all my wishes and efforts, is your independence, because I have the inner conviction that it is also your constant longing, since independence for us means the redemption from slavery and tyranny, the recovery of lost liberty, and the admission to the concert of civilized nations.

That was transmitted by Admiral Dewey on the 17th of July, 1898, and yet he sends a letter here saying that the word "independence" was never used between him and Aguinaldo. I do not impeach the veracity of Admiral Dewey, for it is barely possible that in the conversations between Aguinaldo and Admiral Dewey the word "independence" was never used. The evasion might be made if the Spanish word for "independence" was used; but even if that were not the case, there were five or six cases where the direct connection, the direct knowledge of the claim of the insurgents was brought home to Admiral Dewey. How could he transmit this decree setting forth distinctly and absolutely what the insurgents claimed, and how could he transmit Anderson's telegram in the body of his own, unless he knew what the insurgents demanded? The facts are, Dewey did make an alliance with Aguinaldo, did know that he demanded independence, and Schurman offered gold to Aguinaldo and his followers, either directly or indirectly. Why these evasions? Give us the whole truth.

Oh, Mr. President, the more this matter is turned over and exposed to the view of the American people the more the reason will appear why the Administration withholds the facts.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like, with the leave of the Senate and in justice to myself, to ask the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] one question in regard to the letter he read, though not in regard to the point he made.

In the New York Independent, I think it was, a journal of high respectability, I am sure—and I have no doubt it was the Independent—was reported an address of President Schurman to his pupils at Cornell University, after his return from the Philippines, in which address he says that he thinks Aguinaldo an entirely honest man. He accompanies that statement, I think, by saying that he does not regard Aguinaldo as a man of great intellectual power, using the word "weak," or something of that sort; but he bears his emphatic testimony to Aguinaldo's honesty.

I have quoted that statement in public, and I agree with the honorable Senator from New York in having the highest respect for President Schurman; but has the Senator from New York any information which questions the authority or correctness of that report of President Schurman's statement about Aguinaldo's integrity? If he has, I should wish at once to withdraw my affirmation based upon that report if I have done any injustice to President Schurman in that particular.

Mr. DEPEW. If the Senator will permit me, I have no information on the question except the letter of President Schurman, addressed directly to the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. HOAR. He adverts incidentally to this matter, though he makes no denial of that particular point in the letter. I put this question because I agree whatever may be President Schurman's opinions on this subject are entitled to respect. He is a man whose personal qualities entitle him to the regard of every person in the country; and I supposed it very important testimony, after such things as have been said about the insurgent leader in our press and in the Senate, that the chairman of the Philippine Commission, of course with the fullest knowledge of the transaction which had been charged against Aguinaldo as an act of corruption, had pronounced him, as several of our military commanders have done, a man of integrity.

Perhaps this observation of mine may attract President Schurman's attention. As I have said, he was reported in a speech to his students—a verbatim report in the New York Independent, I think—to have made that declaration.

COLUMBIA HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has been notified that there is a vacancy in the board of directors of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum, which, under the law, is to be filled by the Presiding Officer of the Senate. The Chair appoints to that vacancy the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS].

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is concluded, and the Chair lays before the Senate, by virtue of the unanimous-consent agreement made yesterday, the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I understood yesterday morning that the resolution which I introduced went over until to-day. I inquire if it has been laid before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unanimous-consent agreement made yesterday was that immediately after the completion of the routine morning business the Chair should lay before the Senate the financial bill; and the Chair will be obliged to hold that resolutions coming over from a previous day are not part of the routine morning business.

Mr. PETTIGREW. And that the unanimous consent subsequently given disposed of the unanimous consent given previously?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would think if the Senator desired the two resolutions to remain without prejudice a request should be made to that effect.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to state that had I been here yesterday at the time the consent was given, I should not have consented to the unanimous agreement. It seems to me, with very few Senators present, it was rather a strange order to make. However, the Senate made the order, and I shall, of course, submit to it; but I shall take the first opportunity on the financial bill, unless it shall be considered improper to do so, to address the Senate on the subject of which I gave notice.

Mr. ALLEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ALLEN. Yesterday morning, by unanimous consent, a resolution I introduced some days ago was passed over until this morning as the unfinished business, and was to be laid before the Senate at the conclusion of the regular order as part of the unfinished business. What has become of that, I inquire?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under a subsequent unanimous-consent agreement there was an arrangement made that the financial bill should receive consideration immediately after the disposition of the regular routine morning business, and resolutions coming over from a previous day are not a part of the routine morning business.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to finish my inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. I beg pardon.

Mr. ALLEN. Then, if the hour of 2 o'clock expires without the disposition of that resolution, what will become of it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A request has been made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] that the resolutions be permitted to remain without prejudice where they are; and that has been assented to.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; that is satisfactory.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Chair whether the Chair holds that resolutions which come over from a previous day, as these resolutions have done, are standing upon the Calendar as routine morning business or not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds they are not.

Mr. HOAR. I thought that the Chair said the other day that they were, but I probably misunderstood the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Chair would hold they are not part of the routine morning business. The Chair if left without any former decision would hold that the resolutions which come over should go to the Calendar; but he has yielded to the custom of the Senate, and presented resolutions the next morning where they lie over under objection.

Mr. TURNER rose.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I desire to say, before the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] proceeds, that having given notice that I would call up this morning the resolution in reference to the vacant seat from Pennsylvania, in order that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] might speak, I refrain from doing so, because it was understood—and very properly understood—that no business should interfere with any remarks any Senator might desire to make upon the financial bill from now until next Thursday, when the bill is to be voted upon. Therefore, I do not insist upon bringing that privileged question to the attention of the Senate against the unanimous consent given yesterday, which was a very proper consent to have been given under the circumstances. It was, however, remarked by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] that at any time when no Senator desired to speak upon the financial bill there would be no objection to proceeding with other business; and I shall endeavor to call up the Pennsylvania case whenever any Senator does not desire to speak upon the pending bill.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, we have before us for consideration both the original bill as it passed the House of Representatives and the substitute drafted by the majority of the Finance Committee of this body and reported to us by the latter in lieu of the original bill. The provisions of both measures are identical in their essence, and are intended to effectuate precisely the same objects. The only difference is that the language of the substitute is a little more subtle than that of the original bill, and accomplishes by the indirection of necessary but veiled construction some of the objects which the House bill openly and candidly avows. I think I shall show the essential agreement of the two measures before I conclude my remarks, and, since the House bill may in the end prevail against the Senate substitute, I think it safer to address my remarks to both measures rather than to the Senate substitute alone.

OBJECTS OF THIS LEGISLATION.

The first and most important object of this legislation, as I read it, is to fix and fasten on the American people forever the single gold standard, and, by removing from the arena of contention the only nation whose voice in favor of silver might compel the respect of other nations, to fasten that standard on the world forever.

The next great object is to establish in favor of the national banks of the country a monopoly in the issue and control of all money save gold, and thereby to establish the great trust of trusts, around which all others shall revolve, paying homage to it in time of prosperity and drawing sustenance and support from it in the hour of adversity and threatened disaster.

These are the two great primary objects of both the House and the Senate bill. In devising the machinery to accomplish them it has been thought proper to decree several other results which, in the light of the primary ends sought, may be called subsidiary, but which are so startlingly brazen in their disregard of the rights of the people that, if they stood alone, they would command amazed and indignant attention from every lover of his country and his kind. For instance, it has been thought proper to strike down and reduce to the condition of token money the $600,000,000 of silver money in the country, now coined and in circulation, thus changing by a stroke of the pen an asset of $600,000,000 belonging to the United States and its people into an indebtedness due from them for that stupendous sum. Our Republican friends are not content to give the simple quietus to the white and shining handmaid of civilization for whom they lately professed so much love, but the dagger, after being driven into her heart, is to be turned round so that the wound will give to the world evidence of the ferocity which dealt it, and thus cow into submission the timorous voices which otherwise might lament and denounce and clamor against the cruel deed.

Another subsidiary result decreed is the increase by a quarter of a billion of dollars of the market value of the interest-bearing obligations of the Government in the hands of their individual holders. This is to be done not by legitimately appreciating the credit of the Government and thereby benefiting the holders of our securities—no one could complain of that—but it is to be done by giving up and surrendering a valuable option in our favor declared by the almost unanimous voice of the Government to exist as early as the year 1878, and which we expressly declined to surrender at the time of one of our later bond issues, although then offered $16,000,000 to give up the option in connection with that bond issue.

Another subsidiary object decreed is the contraction of the circulating medium of the country to the extent of more than $900,000,000 until such time as the national banks may have increased their capitalization sufficiently to enable them to supply the deficit, thus incurring the certainty of great loss and inconvenience and the very great risk of irreparable disaster.

Another most remarkable means to the accomplishment of the ends sought is the vesting in the Secretary of the Treasury of the power, in executing the main purposes of the law, to issue, at will and ad libitum, the interest-bearing bonds of the nation. The people of the country will not soon forget the extraordinary course resorted to by Mr. Cleveland to extricate his Administration from its financial difficulties, when, instead of using the $500,000,000 of full legal-tender silver money then lying in the Treasury, he increased the interest-bearing debt of the country to the extent of more than $250,000,000, by borrowing that amount of money in gold and issuing the bonds of the Government therefor. With the same amount of silver money still in the Treasury, it is now gravely proposed to confer on the Secretary of the Treasury, as an ordinary everyday prerogative, and for the very purpose of destroying the debt-paying quality of that silver, the power which Mr. Cleveland exercised in the last resort and as a desperate expedient. And all this in the face of a record of Republican clamor and abuse and objurgation against Mr. Cleveland only six years ago, in both branches of Congress and in the public press, and of protestation in favor of silver and of denunciation against those who would debase and degrade it, which ought to estop and conclude any political party from proceeding in the same direction now, and which would conclude and estop any party not calloused to criticism by a reliance on the power of wealth for its success rather than on the intelligent voice of the common people of the land.

THE TWO BILLS ARE ONE.

Mr. President, I shall address myself to the task of showing by an analysis of these measures that the foregoing general summary of their purpose and effect is well within the limit of their provisions, and in so doing I shall make good as I go along my statement that the House bill and the Senate substitute are in effect one and the same thing. There is a declaration in each measure that the gold dollar shall be the standard unit of value and the two declarations are almost identical in terms. There are provisions in the respective measures making all forms of money issued or coined by the Government redeemable in money of the standard value, namely, gold; and these provisions, while not identical in terms, are so in effect. The House bill, after providing for the redemption in gold of all interest-bearing obligations of the United States, and all United States notes and Treasury notes, and all other public obligations of the Government, makes this provision concerning the redemption of silver money:

SEC. 4. * * * And if at any time the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States, he may, at his discretion, exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States.

The transaction here described is called "exchange," but an obligation to exchange gold for any other "form of money issued or coined by the United States" is, of course, as everybody knows, an obligation to redeem that money in gold, and everybody knows, likewise, that silver is one of the "forms of money issued or coined by the United States." The Senate substitute effectuates the same thing in this regard as the House bill, but with more subtlety and less danger of exposure to criticism. It provides:

SEC. 1. That the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine shall, as established by section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, continue to be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard; and United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, when presented to the Treasury for redemption, shall be redeemed in gold coin of such standard.

This is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to take such steps as he may deem necessary to keep silver at a parity with gold, and it means, as he will understand, and as it is meant that he shall understand, that he may, at his discretion, establish the practice that silver when presented at the Treasury will be redeemed in gold. It has been claimed heretofore by the Secretary of the Treasury, notably by Mr. Carlisle, and, if I am not mistaken, by Mr. Gage also, that the act of November 1, 1893, repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, conferred the power on the Secretary to redeem silver with gold when it declared it—to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coin of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the market and in the payment of debts.

As matter of fact, this declaration is very far from conferring a power of redemption on the Secretary of the Treasury. Both gold and silver, according to that declaration, were to continue "as standard money" and to be coined into money of "equal intrinsic and exchangeable value," and this was to be done either by international agreement or the safeguards of Congressional legislation. Moreover, the Congressional legislation contemplated did involve the expedient of redeeming silver in gold, because that not would have been to discontinue silver "as standard money," and would have had the immediate result of destroying the "equal intrinsic and exchangeable value" of the money coined from the two metals. The difference between the declaration of the act of 1893 and the provision on the same subject found in the present Senate substitute and the far-reaching effect of the latter will be readily seen when the two are contrasted. The language of the act of 1893 was a declaration of governmental policy. That of this proposed law is a direction for administrative guidance. The act of 1893 proposed to maintain, by and through the influence of legislation giving both metals a fair show, the equal intrinsic value of both silver and gold. This act proposes simply that silver money shall be maintained at a parity of value with the standard money, leaving it to the discretion of the Executive Department to adopt such means as it may deem expedient for that purpose, and indicating the means by providing for the redemption of other forms of money in gold. Finally, the act of 1893 was a declaration that silver should never be dishonored, and that its rank as one of the standard money metals would be maintained by this Government by every means at its command. This act has for its prime object the purpose to degrade and debase and dishonor silver; to strike it down absolutely as standard money; to deprive it of its character of money at all and to make it simply a representative of money.

A REPUBLICAN BUBBLE.

Our Republican friends will fail, I apprehend, when they go before the country and claim that this proposed law is simply a reaffirmation of former law, and that the power conferred by it on the Secretary of the Treasury is one which he has had and which he might have exercised at any time since the year of 1893. It is well that this bubble should burst before it has been fully blown. To more completely explode it I hope some Senator will, at the proper time, offer an amendment to section 1 of the Senate substitute, providing that nothing therein contained shall be construed as authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem at the Treasury, or elsewhere, with gold, any of the outstanding silver money of the United States. If our friends shall accept such an amendment, then, while I shall not admit that I am mistaken as to the effect of their proposed measure, I shall admit that I am mistaken as to the effect which its framers intended it to have. If they shall refuse to accept it, their action will be a confession that both the actual and intended effect of their guarded but skilfully worded legislation is such as I have described.

We have, then, in both of these measures, not only an affirmation of the single gold standard, but provisions designed to clinch that affirmation for all time by destroying absolutely and in toto the character of silver as money. When either measure shall have passed it will be the sheerest folly to continue the use of silver as money, because a token of much less marketable value and of infinitely greater convenience can be found to take its place. What would be thought of a policy of printing paper dollars on thick clumsy paper costing 60 cents per single sheet when paper equally as good and much more convenient for the purpose could be obtained for 60 cents per thousand sheets? Yet, when silver is degraded to the position of token money and made redeemable in gold, that is what we will be doing, in effect, if we continue its use as money. Better call the silver all in, melt it down into bullion and sell it for what it will bring in the market, and make all our token money both cheap and uniform by the exclusive use of paper.

I do not mean to argue that a place is not left for silver as a subsidiary token coin. The necessity of money of minor denominations for change and small transactions which this bill creates will leave that money a place in the business of the country, but it is a most insignificant place, and one which will still further dishonor and degrade the white metal. Moreover, it is a place which a very small volume of coin will adequately fill, and we may well dismiss a consideration of it as unworthy of serious regard.

BANKS WILL CONTROL.

Now, to proceed a step further. Both the House bill and the Senate substitute are in substantial accord in the provisions designed to accomplish the second primary object described by me, namely, to create and establish in the national banks a monopoly in the issue and control of all money save gold. While neither the House bill nor the Senate bill makes provision against the reissue of silver coin when it shall come into the Treasury by exchange, redemption, or otherwise; yet, no longer being standard money, and deriving its value largely from the redemption quality attached to it, it can not, in good faith, be paid out to ordinary creditors; and if it should be so paid out at one counter of the Treasury, it could, under the operation of these proposed measures, be immediately taken to another counter and exchanged for gold. No one will want silver money, both because of the legislation discrediting it and because paper is more convenient to handle. No one will want silver certificates, payable exclusively in silver, because in order to turn them into gold, the money now which all must have, you must by one process of exchange first transmute them into silver dollars and then by a second exchange transmute the silver into gold. This can all be done by preferring the gold itself, or, if paper be desired for convenience, by insisting on the gold certificates which both these measures alike permit to be issued. Indeed, the very first fiscal operation the banks will undertake with the Government after the passage of either of these measures, unless they have put off the dross of humanity and take on the unselfishness of immortality, will be to transmute their silver dollars and silver certificates into gold certificates. They can first surrender their silver certificates and obtain silver. Then they can exchange the silver for gold. They can then deposit the gold and obtain gold certificates. As the outstanding silver dollars and silver certificates amount approximately to $500,000,000 and it is now proposed to increase the gold reserve to $150,000,000, this raid of the banks would require the Government to provide itself with $650,000,000 in gold. It now has in the Treasury approximately $250,000,000 in gold. It would be compelled to provide $400,000,000 more gold. The only way to do that would be to issue the 3 per cent bonds, which both of the proposed measures provide for just such an emergency, and to borrow on them the needed gold; so that the currency will not only be contracted $500,000,000 immediately if either of these measures be passed, but the people will have been saddled with $400,000,000 more of bonded indebtedness to the profit of the banks and of the money changers, whose intervention seems necessary whenever the Government needs to borrow money. Should the Government ever succeed in again forcing the silver into circulation, this operation could be repeated over and over again until we had absorbed all the surplus gold in the world and mortgaged ourselves therefor to an extent which neither our children nor our children's children would ever see the end of. The ability to repeat this endless-chain performance is the only thing that will ever again float silver beyond the Treasury doors, and the certainty that silver could and would be used for that purpose is the safe and sure guaranty afforded the banks that after it has once been redeemed it will never again see the light of day or ever again be permitted to vex and confound them in their schemes to corner the money of the nation. So much for the silver money, both the coin and the certificates.

Our paper money, outside the gold and silver certificates and a very few currency certificates, is composed of $346,681,016 in United States notes, commonly called greenbacks, and $93,518,280 in Treasury notes, issued under the act of July 14, 1890, both amounting in the aggregate to $440,199,296. The House bill and the Senate substitute, while not identical in terms, are in substantial harmony in the provisions made to retire these forms of money from circulation. The language of the Senate substitute is:

> And United States notes, and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, when presented to the Treasury for redemption, shall be redeemed in gold coin of such standard.

When this paper money has thus gotten into the Treasury, section 2 of the Senate substitute makes it the duty of the Secretary to use it in the following manner: First, to exchange it for any gold coin in the general fund of the Treasury; secondly, to exchange it for any gold which individuals may offer at the Treasury for that purpose, and third, to purchase gold with it in the open market at such rate of discount as may then prevail in the market. Now, since individuals may under both measures present their gold at the Treasury and obtain gold certificates for it, it is certain they would not part with their gold for a less satisfactory form of paper money. The only way, then, which this act leaves by which we may get the paper money in circulation again is to go into the open market and purchase gold with it. This would immediately place gold at a premium, and no Administration would either wish to do that or would dare to do it if it had the inclination.

GOLD AND NATIONAL BANK NOTES.

While the Senate substitute does not expressly declare that the paper money shall not be again paid out in the ordinary course of business, that is undoubtedly its purpose. The express mention of the manner in which it shall be dealt with by the Secretary is the exclusion of every other means of dealing with it. Expressio unias, est exclusio alterius. So that the Treasury notes and greenbacks, having once got into the Treasury, are there for all time and might as well be sent to the macerater at once. The House bill does directly and certainly what the Senate bill does by indirection, but with no less certainty. It provides:

> The notes and certificates so redeemed or exchanged shall be held in and constitute a part of said redemption fund, and shall not be withdrawn therefrom nor disturbed except in exchange for an equivalent amount of the coin in which said notes were redeemed, or exchanged, etc.

The amount of money, then, which it is proposed to retire by this legislation is as follows:

Silver, approximately	$500,000,000
Treasury notes and greenbacks	440,199,296

This will be to withdraw from circulation almost one-half of the money in the country. If it were to be permanently withdrawn, everyone knows that the results would be frightful. I shall not accuse any person of desiring to produce results so baneful and sinister. Our Republican friends are simply endeavoring to create a hiatus into which the national banks may step. The idea in this regard is to vest them with the function heretofore exercised by Congress of regulating and controlling the money supply of the nation. This has long been a favorite idea with the Secretary of the Treasury. We all remember his appearance before the House committee more than two years ago and the exposition of his policy at that time. He wanted to fasten the gold standard on the country and to vest the power to issue paper money in the banks, where it would be controlled by the law of supply and demand. The incident made a deep impression, because it was so soon after the Presidential election, in which the Republican party had pledged itself to secure bimetallism by international agreement; because we then had a commission in Europe endeavoring to negotiate such international agreement, and because when that commission returned its chairman excoriated the Secretary while complimenting the President on his steadfast adherence to principle. But it appears now that the Secretary was better acquainted with the purposes and views of the President than the distinguished Senator from Colorado who was chairman of the Monetary Commission. Note now what the President says in his last annual message, observe its agreement in every respect with the analysis which I have made of the provisions of these two measures, and then judge between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Senator from Colorado. The President says:

In its earlier history the national banking act seemed to prove a reasonable avenue through which needful additions to the circulation could from time to time be made. Changing conditions have apparently rendered it now inoperative to that end. The high margin in bond securities required, resulting from large premiums which Government bonds command in the market, or the tax on note issues, or both operating together, appear to be the influences which impair its public utility.

The attention of Congress is respectfully invited to this important matter with the view of ascertaining whether or not such reasonable modifications can be made in the national banking act as will render its service in the particulars here referred to more responsive to the people's needs. I again urge that national banks be authorized to organize with a capital of $25,000.

I urgently recommend that to support the existing gold standard, and to maintain "the parity in value of the two metals (gold and silver) and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the market and in the payment of debts," the Secretary of the Treasury be given additional power and charged with the duty to sell United States bonds and to employ such other effective means as may be necessary to these ends.

The authority should include the power to sell bonds on long and short time, as conditions may require, and should provide for a rate of interest lower than that fixed by the act of January 14, 1875. While there is now no commercial fright which withdraws gold from the Government, but, on the contrary, such widespread confidence that gold seeks the Treasury, demanding paper money in exchange, yet the very situation points to the present as the most fitting time to make adequate provision to insure the continuance of the gold standard and of public confidence in the ability and purpose of the Government to meet all its obligations in the money which the civilized world recognizes as the best. The financial transactions of the Government are conducted upon a gold basis.

We receive gold when we sell United States bonds and use gold for their payment. We are maintaining the parity of all the money issued or coined by authority of the Government. We are doing these things with the means at hand. Happily at the present time we are not compelled to resort to loans to supply gold. It has been done in the past, however, and may have to be done in the future. It behooves us, therefore, to provide at once the best means to meet the emergency when it arises, and the best means are those which are most certain and economical. Those now authorized have the virtue neither of directness nor economy.

We have already eliminated one of the causes of our financial plight and embarrassment during the years 1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896. Our receipts now equal our expenditures; deficient revenues no longer create alarm. Let us remove the only remaining cause by conferring the full and necessary power on the Secretary of the Treasury, and impose upon him the duty to uphold the present gold standard and preserve the coins of the two metals on a parity with each other, which is the repeatedly declared policy of the United States.

In this connection I repeat my former recommendations, that a portion of the gold holdings shall be placed in a trust fund, from which greenbacks shall be redeemed upon presentation, but when once redeemed shall not thereafter be paid out except for gold.

REPUBLICAN PERFIDY.

Mr. President, no one in the Republican party any longer professes friendship for silver. Even the President, who thinks it the part of wisdom, if not of statesmanship, to follow where others would lead, has seen his way clear to advance to the position of the Secretary of the Treasury, and, throwing behind him the professions of an entire lifetime, has thought it well to recommend to Congress legislation designed "to support the existing gold standard." No one, however, who has studied the tendencies of the Republican party of late years and the peculiar characteristics of our honored Chief Executive is surprised, unless we except the junior Senator from Colorado. This exception appears to be necessary in view of the warm and impassioned eulogy which that Senator, on returning from his fruitless trip abroad, delivered on the President as an earnest and ardent friend of the cause of bimetallism. So clearly do both of these measures prove the abandonment by the Republican party of its former professed friendship for silver that the majority of the Finance Committee became alarmed, after reporting their substitute to the Senate, at the clear evidence of Republican perfidy thus afforded, and on yesterday they reported an amendment reviving the old farce of international agreement which was used with such dishonest effect in 1896. That amendment reads:

That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism, provided the same be received by concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world, and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver.

But the people of the United States can not be longer deluded with such chaff. The Secretary of the Treasury came to the conclusion more than two years ago that it was a worn-out expedient. The President has now evidently come to the same conclusion. The House of Representatives indorses both of them in that view. And before the dog days are done the Finance Committee of the United States Senate will be reluctantly compelled to see the matter in the same light.

Mr. President, it will be observed from my analysis of these measures, and also from the recommendations of the President's message, which both measures were framed to carry out, that I was justified in stating that the second primary object of this legislation was to vest a monopoly of money in the national banks. In anticipation of that result both measures make provision for increased facilities on the part of the banks to add to their circulation. The provisions in the House bill to that end are the most marked and pronounced and many radical changes are there proposed. The Senate substitute, pursuant to the policy, which appears to have been thought wise, of muddying the waters, is not quite so radical. However, it is sufficient, and under its provisions, if adopted, the banks will have no difficulty in adjusting themselves to an execution of the sovereign power there conferred on them. They can contract the circulating medium to the vanishing point or expand it to the bursting point at will, and the man little understands human nature who imagines that they will exercise this great power with any other view than that of their own enrichment. And the enrichment of one set of men through the delegation of sovereign power means the impoverishment of everybody else. It always has been so on this earth, and always will be so until the millennium, and I fear, if this proposed legislation may be accepted as indicative of the average of human thought and purpose toward our fellows, that that beatific state of the world is still far in the indefinite future.

Mr. President, to be strictly accurate, the money to be retired from circulation under these measures in kind and amount is as follows:

Silver dollars in circulation	$85,191,429
Silver certificates outstanding, representing—
Silver dollars in the Treasury	402,190,017
Treasury notes, act July 14, 1890	93,518,280
United States notes, greenbacks	346,681,666

Add to this $150,000,000 gold reserve, to be maintained in the Treasury at all times, and this will require the Government, in the immediate future, to come into the possession of $1,076,527,992 in gold. Of this sum we now have in the Treasury $283,759,703. We will be required then to provide, in addition to the last-named sum, $792,767,289 more gold to meet the demands on the Treasury. These figures are stupendous, but the gold can be procured. We have not sufficient in this country to supply the amount needed, but our credit is good, and the entire world stands ready to honor our requisition when backed by the bonds of the nation. Both the Senate bill and the House bill are full in their provisions authorizing the issue of bonds to meet the necessities of the nation to be created by this great drain on the Treasury. I quote from section 2 of the Senate bill, so that the country may see how fully the authors of that measure realized the necessity of resorting to loans to meet the demand created by their bill:

If the Secretary of the Treasury is unable to restore and maintain the gold coin in the reserve fund by the foregoing methods, and the amount of such gold coin in said fund shall at any time fall below $100,000,000, then it shall be his duty to restore and maintain the same by borrowing money on the credit of the United States, and for the debt thus incurred to issue and sell coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing interest at the rate of not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable quarterly, etc.

Mr. President, this process of retiring our own money in order to give the banks a monopoly of furnishing the money supply will require an issue of bonds to the amount of $792,767,289. At 3 per cent per annum, the amount fixed by each of these measures, this will cost the taxpayers every year the sum of $23,783,018.67. If we adopt twenty years as the average life of the bonds, the taxpayers will have paid at the end of that time for the privilege of further enriching the national banks and investing them with autocratic power the sum of $475,660,373.40. These things come high to the taxpayer, but in this day and age, when our financial institutions are found contributing $15,000,000 to one political party in a single political campaign, the interests of the taxpayers, who have nothing but votes to give, and who can be bamboozled into giving them, are a secondary consideration.

GOLD FOR ALL OBLIGATIONS.

Mr. President, I proceed now a step further in my analysis of these measures. When it comes to an explicit direction making all the obligations of the nation payable in gold coin, the two measures are somewhat variant. Section 2 of the House bill takes the bull by the horns and provides in express terms:

That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States, as defined in section 1 of this act, etc.

The Senate measure is not nearly so explicit. Its authors apparently could see no virtue in being so direct and incriminating. After making silver to be redeemed in gold it did not seem necessary to their minds to make further provision directing the use of gold in paying the bonds of the nation. When the holders could take their silver and demand gold for it, it would simply be an avoidance of clumsy circumlocution for the Secretary to establish the practice of paying the bonds in gold in the first instance. Moreover, the bulk of our bonded debt is approaching maturity, and it was easier and far less embarrassing to make a renewal of those bonds the vehicle for introducing the gold-paying clause than to apply it directly to the present outstanding bonds, as the House bill does. Accordingly, we find the following elaborate provision in the Senate substitute for the refunding of our 3, 4, and 5 per cent bonds:

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive at the Treasury any of the outstanding bonds of the United States bearing interest at 5 per cent per annum, payable February 1, 1904, and any of the bonds of the United States bearing interest at 4 per cent per annum, payable July 1, 1907, and any bonds of the United States bearing interest at 3 per cent per annum, payable August 1, 1908, and to issue in exchange therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, payable quarterly, such bonds to be payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue, and said bonds to be payable, principal and interest, in gold coin of the present standard value, and to be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority: Provided, That none of such outstanding bonds shall be received in such exchange at a valuation greater than their present worth to yield an income of 2½ per cent per annum, and said bonds shall be issued at not less than par: And provided further, That such bonds when issued shall be numbered consecutively in the order of their issue, and when payment is made the last numbers issued shall be first paid, and this order shall be followed until all the bonds are paid; and whenever any of the outstanding bonds are called for payment interest thereon shall cease three months after such call: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the difference between the present worth, computed as aforesaid, of the outstanding bonds surrendered in accordance with the provisions of this act and their par value.

Mr. President, the present worth of the outstanding bonds of the descriptions mentioned in the foregoing section is, on an average, about 1.12. This would entitle the holder of each outstanding $1,000 bond to receive in exchange a 2 per cent gold bond for $1,120. The income from this $1,120 bond, giving it an average life of twenty years, which, as it is payable any time at the pleasure of the Government, is a fair average, would be as follows:

Annual interest at 2 per cent on $1,120	$22.40
Division of premium of $120 into 20 annual payments and applied each year for 20 years	6.00

This is equivalent to exchanging at par the present coin bonds for gold bonds bearing interest at the rate of 2.840 per cent per annum, or nearly 3 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. Would I interrupt the Senator if I called his attention to another portion of the bill, which he seems to have overlooked?

Mr. TURNER. Not at all.

Mr. ALLISON. That is, that there shall be no more of the bonds issued than the bonds taken up. So it is impossible to have an eleven hundred and twenty dollar bond as suggested.

Mr. TURNER. The bonds are to be taken up that are then outstanding, at the market value, and if you take up a thousand-dollar bond worth $120 premium on the market, how are you to get it without issuing bonds to cover the premium?

Mr. ALLISON. By paying the difference in money. It expressly provides for that. I merely call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the bonded debt is not increased under the bill.

Mr. TURNER. It is wholly immaterial whether it is paid in money or in bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. It may be immaterial, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that it is not paid in bonds.

Mr. TURNER. I apprehend when you go into this business you can not get this extra $120——

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. TURNER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Gage, in his testimony before the House committee two years ago, said it would increase the bonded indebtedness of the United States by $90,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. But we have expressly provided here that it shall not.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Secretary of the Treasury was discussing another act, one framed upon a different basis.

Mr. ALLEN. It was substantially the same.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not substantially the same, because it proposed to issue an additional amount of bonds.

Mr. TURNER. More than all that, our friends on the other side can not be assured that their own substitute is going to pass. The House bill is to be considered here as well as the Senate bill. The bill we have here may not be the one which ultimately is to become the law.

Mr. ALDRICH. The House bill contains no provision of the kind—nothing in regard to refunding.

Mr. TURNER. I think it does. I think my analysis has shown it. But perhaps the Senator was not here when I was on that subject.

The method of exchange provided and the rate at which the exchange is to be made is, as I said, equivalent to 2.840 per cent per annum, or nearly 3 per cent. It is fully equivalent to 3 per cent, if not more, when we consider that the holders are to now receive the premium in a lump, instead of having it spread out over a long series of years, and that this premium lasts until the bonds are paid, and is paid when they are, instead of suffering the depreciation to which the premiums on all bonds are subject as the latter near maturity of payment. As we have been able at any time during the last ten years to float 3 per cent coin bonds at par, and even above par, it will be seen that the only difference between the House bill and the Senate substitute, so far as the provisions for the payment of our bonded obligations in gold are concerned, is that under the House bill they are to run until maturity at the present rate of interest, and then be payable in gold, which will be done by refunding them into gold bonds, while under the Senate substitute they are to be refunded into gold bonds immediately, but at a lower rate of interest than they now bear. To the extent last stated the Senate substitute is an improvement on the House bill.

Under the operation of both measures, then, our outstanding bonds are to be made payable in gold. This follows as a necessary corollary of the provisions making gold the single and sole standard of money. If the one thing is to be done, the other must necessarily follow. But the cost is something to make one marvel. For more than twenty years we have had the following resolution concerning our bonded debt, known as the Stanley Matthews resolution, on our statute books:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring thereto), That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars, of the coinage of the United States, containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith, nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

That resolution passed both Houses of Congress in 1878 by large majorities, and it received the vote, I believe, of every Republican then and now in public life. Under it, and with full knowledge of its terms, every Government bond now outstanding has been accepted by its holder. With half a billion dollars in silver money in the Treasury, we are now giving up our option to pay these bonds in that kind of money. If our credit were impaired there might be some reason for making the sacrifice. But our coin bonds, payable in either metal at the option of the Government, are selling in the market at from 10 to 40 per cent above par, the premium varying according to the interest rate and the length of time the bonds may run. Why are we doing it then? Because if the effort to strike down silver is to succeed, we must do it. To make gold the only standard money and then decline to pay in it would be ridiculous and absurd.

THE PRICE OF THE GOLD WHISTLE.

Now, how much are we paying in this matter alone for our new gold whistle? In the spring of 1895 Mr. Cleveland negotiated a loan of $62,315,435, and delivered 4 per cent bonds therefor. He notified Congress, however, that if it would consent to make the bonds gold bonds the purchasers would accept a rate of 3 per cent, and thus save the Government, during the life of the bonds, the sum of $16,174,770. Here is what Mr. Cleveland said to Congress:

The arrangement just completed * * * develops such a difference in the estimation of investors between bonds made payable in coin and those specifically made payable in gold in favor of the latter, as represented by three-fourths of a cent in annual interest. In the agreement just concluded the annual saving in interest to the Government, if 3 per cent gold bonds should be substituted for 4 per cent coin bonds under the privilege reserved, would be $539,159, amounting in thirty years, or at the maturity of the coin bonds, to $16,174,770.

Congress, however, declined, even for the proffered saving, to degrade silver by making the bonds payable in gold, and none were more vehement in denouncing the proposition than the Republican Senators and Representatives then in public life. Now, if there be the same proportional difference in value between all our outstanding coin bonds and strict gold bonds, and it is hard to see why there should not be, it is a mere matter of mathematical calculation to determine the value of the right we are now giving up. The proportion that 16,000,000 bears to 62,000,000, applied to our entire bonded indebtedness, amounting to $1,300,000,000, gives us as a result, roughly speaking, $325,000,000. That sum, then, is the value of our option to pay in silver, which we are making a present of to the holders of our bonds. If it is worth that to them, it is worth that to us.

Yes, Mr. President, to speak broadly, it is worth ten times that sum to us, because if we retain it we will be in honor bound to maintain silver as a money metal, to enter on a policy which will support and uphold its dignity and sustain its purchasing and debt-paying power. In the enhanced value which a successful maintenance of that policy would give to our products now and in the future the sum of $325,000,000 would, by comparison, be a mere bagatelle. But I see nowhere in either of these measures any indication that the interests of the people of this country have been considered. The Republican party is legislating for the moneyed interests, and those interests require not cheap money and dear goods, but dear money and cheap goods; they require not an amplitude of money and an enhancement of prices, but a paucity of money and a decline of prices. Let it be so. I welcome this evidence of the solicitude of that party for their very dear friends. It comes at an opportune time. My only surprise is that the Republican party, with its record of shiftiness on this question, could get its own consent to come out into the open in a Presidential year and in advance of the casting of the votes.

A NEW SLAVERY.

Mr. President, the fight made in this country to preserve silver as money is the only issue we have had since the abolition of slavery which has appealed to the higher sensibilities of the human mind and aroused to life and energy the nobler emotions of the human heart. This is so because the question involves the never-ceasing conflict of interest between aggressive power, panoplied with all the aids that make for success, and impotent weakness, naked and helpless before its confident and ever-pushing adversary. In that conflict, bottomed as it is on the selfishness of human nature, strength is always advancing because it can and weakness receding because it must, and if there were not a power somewhere to throw its force into the scale and restore the equilibrium the process would go on until there was absolute dominion on the one hand and abject slavery on the other. It always has been so where power could work its will, and it always will be so. The overruling force that intervenes when the process has reached a point that provokes the attention of the world is the enlightened conscience of mankind. Such a conflict has been going on for the last twenty-five years throughout the entire world, strength being represented by the wealth of the few and weakness by the poverty of the many. The struggle has been to enhance the purchasing power of the money controlled by the former and to diminish thereby the selling power of the commodities produced by the latter. I would not say that any single individual has consciously acted on such a view. We are all of us prone to associate our own interests with those of our country, and this conflict has been going on between strong and weak nations as well as between strong and weak individuals. The creditor nation wants dear money and cheap commodities, the same as the creditor individual. And even the weak nation, like the weak individual, may feel called on to submit to the exactions of power, and to conform its fiscal and commercial policy to that of its neighbors, lest it meet with further aggressions, which might lay it helpless and prostrate at the feet of its adversary. So that men of every nation are always able to bolster themselves with the satisfaction of believing that their action, however selfish it might be if it concerned their individual interests alone, is really based on a patriotic conception of that which is best for the interests of the country at large. But, however, it is the leaven of self-interest at bottom, scarcely perceived, perhaps not perceived at all, that turns the scale, and the individual generally finds himself acting with his own class and as his and its interests seem to require.

This conflict, I say, has been going on for the last twenty-five years, and it has taken the form of an attempt to lessen the supply of metallic money in the world in order that that which remains may increase in purchasing power, and thus further enrich its owners by an unearned increment to be paid by the masses in cheapened products. The governing powers of Europe, with this end in view, determined more than twenty-five years ago that silver should cease to be money, and they kept up the struggle until in a very short time every nation in Europe of any consequence had ceased to coin silver. We ourselves in 1873, through ignorance of the import of our action, forbade silver free and unlimited access to our mints, and thereby joined the coalition of the classes against the masses. But our statesmen soon realized what they had done, and then a struggle began to right the great wrong, which has continued with varying fortunes down to the present moment. At times it has seemed on the point of succeeding, but ignorance, weakness, and selfishness have always had the power to postpone victory, and now it would seem as if a combination of those forces was about to fasten the great iniquity of gold monometallism on the world for all time to come.

The Republican party does not lend itself to these forces in ignorance of the nature of its act or of the consequences which will ensue. On the contrary, it is proceeding with open eyes and in the light of long-continued discussion in which it participated, of legislative declarations which it helped to make, and of solemn party pledges which it may now ignore, but which will ever rise up to accuse and convict it of perjured faithlessness.

Mr. Blaine said in a speech in this body as long ago as 1878:

I believe gold and silver coin to be the money of the Constitution—indeed, the money of the American people anterior to the Constitution, which that great organic law recognized as quite independent of its own existence. No power was conferred on Congress to declare that either metal should not be money. Congress has, therefore, in my judgment, no power to demonetize silver any more than to demonetize gold; no power to demonetize either any more than to demonetize both. * * * Few persons can be found, I apprehend, who will maintain that Congress possesses the power to demonetize both gold and silver, or that Congress could be justified in prohibiting the coinage of both; and yet in logic and legal construction it would be difficult to show where and why the power of Congress over silver is greater than over gold—greater over either than over the two. If, therefore, silver has been demonetized, I am in favor of remonetizing it. If its coinage has been prohibited, I am in favor of ordering it to be resumed. If it has been restricted, I am in favor of having it enlarged.

* * * * * * *

I believe the struggle now going on in this country and in other countries for a single gold standard would, if successful, produce widespread disaster in the end throughout the commercial world. The destruction of silver as money, and establishing gold as the sole unit of value, must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property except those investments which yield a fixed return in money. These would be enormously enhanced in value, and would gain a disproportionate and unfair advantage over every other species of property. If, as the most reliable statistics affirm, there are nearly $7,000,000,000 of coin or bullion in the world, not very unequally divided between gold and silver, it is impossible to strike silver out of existence as money without results which will prove distressing to millions and utterly disastrous to tens of thousands. (From speech in U. S. Senate February 7, 1878.)

Mr. McKinley, in a public speech at Toledo, Ohio, as late as February 12, 1891, said:

During all of Grover Cleveland's years at the head of the Government he was dishonoring one of our precious metals, one of our own products, discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold. He endeavored even before his inauguration to office to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and afterwards and to the end of his Administration persistently used his power to that end. He was determined to contract the circulating medium and to demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce, and therefore dear. He would have increased the value of money and diminished the value of everything else—money the master, everything else the servant. He was not thinking of "the poor" then. He had left "their side." He was not standing forth in their defense. Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money! The sponsor and promoter of these professing to stand guard over the welfare of the poor and lowly! Was there ever more inconsistency or reckless assumption!

Between these speeches and before and since our political literature has been enriched with a wealth of discussion and illustration from Republican sources, and all in the same line, from which I would quote if it were not to weary the Senate with the iteration of things which it has heard so often and knows so well, I will content myself with the statement that almost every Republican statesman in public life to-day has at one time or another given utterances in this or the other Chamber, or on the stump, to language showing the most perfect familiarity with the true reason for the crusade against silver and the fullest comprehension of the baleful results to ensue to the people if that crusade should in the end be successful.

In 1888 Mr. McKinley, then chairman of the platform committee of the Republican national convention, reported to the convention and procured to be adopted on the subject of bimetallism, the following plank:

The Republican party is in favor of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

In 1892 the Republican party adopted this platform on the subject of bimetallism:

The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demand the use of both gold and silver as a standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal. We commend the wise and patriotic steps taken by our Government to secure an international conference and adopt such measures as will insure a parity between gold and silver for use as money throughout the world.

It is evident, then, that the Republican party is not now proceeding in ignorance of the principles underlying the question, or of the effect which must sooner or later ensue, should the present efforts of its leaders in Congress be successful. Our Republican friends have simply turned a deaf ear to their own teachings, and at the dictation of the selfish interests to which they have surrendered have abandoned the people to the evils they have so often foretold and which they foresee now as plainly as at any former period in the history of their party.

BOASTING OF A BUNCO GAME.

Mr. President, the silver question is not dead, but if it were so, as Republican orators and newspapers tauntingly proclaim, it might be written on its tombstone, "Dead in the house of its friends, and murdered by the author of its being." So certain are our Republican friends that it is dead that they have begun to quarrel over the question of who delivered the coup de grace. It is assumed that the money plank of the St. Louis convention, that skilfully constructed juggle of words designed to read all things to all men, did the business, and two distinguished Republican citizens are proudly claiming the authorship of that plank. The controversy waxed so warm that it involved to a greater or less extent most of the shining lights who were at St. Louis assisting in that pious fraud, and nearly all of them have now spoken, giving such lucid testimony that both distinguished citizens feel fully confirmed thereby in the honor which they have claimed. For my part, speaking merely to the truth of history, and without desiring to disturb the satisfied equanimity which any man may feel in his achievements, I should as soon boast of a successful confidence game practiced on some confiding innocent as to claim credit for the financial plank of the St. Louis platform, because if a bunco game was ever successfully played, one was perpetrated when the people of the United States were induced by that plank to vote Mr. McKinley into the Presidential chair. If the silver question be dead, indeed, and these measures of legislation are intended for its burial, let it not be forgotten by our Republican friends that all must die, and that there is a resurrection morn when all shall stand before the great white throne, the deserving to drink of the water of eternal life, "But the fearful, and unbelieving, and abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolators, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone."

No Republican to-day denies the principle, laid down by political economists without exception, that the general level of prices of all commodities is determined by the volume of money in existence, and that to decrease the volume of money is to decrease the general average of prices, and to increase the volume of money is to increase the general average of prices. They can not deny it, because it is too well established and has been too many times illustrated and proven in the history of the world. But they say that the output of gold has increased so enormously of late years that that metal is sufficient to bear the burden formerly borne by both gold and silver, and they point to the present alleged prosperity of our country in confirmation of their contention. But our prosperity, such as it is, is only comparative. It is based on a range of prices for all the products of the workshop, the forge, and the farm, which are 50 per cent less than those which prevailed twenty-five years ago, when silver was first struck down. Such a result, succeeding the true prosperity of that day, would have been starvation then; but succeeding a long period of starvation now, it may in a sense be called prosperity.

OUR PROSPERITY.

Without stopping to discuss the effect which the war with Spain and the present war with the Filipinos may have had in producing such prosperity as we now enjoy, or the influence thereon of a repeated failure of crops in other countries while our own have been bountiful, it is sufficient for the purposes of my argument to say that the claim of increased prosperity by reason of the bountiful output of gold, or the admission that that has had influence in that direction, is the highest confirmation of the correctness of those who in 1896 laid our evils to the striking down of silver, and who insisted that it could be corrected by again restoring silver to its full function as one of our money metals. It is striking proof of the fact that prosperity depends on the possession of an ample volume of primary money, capable of paying debts everywhere throughout the world. Now, with this fact conceded and emphasized, how can any fair-minded man, desirous of promoting the happiness and prosperity of our people, get his own consent to proceed to the final and irremediable destruction of silver money by the passage of either one of these measures now before Congress? Who can say how long this increased output of gold is to continue? And when it ceases, as it must do, sooner or later, what barrier are we then to interpose against the renewed appreciation of money and the renewed depreciation of all other forms of property? When that process shall again commence and proceed as far and as rapidly as it did from 1873 to 1900, our farmers will be serfs, our mechanics bondmen, and our laborers slaves. With the immediate past behind them and its lessons graven on their minds, with the prospective future before them and its consequences so clearly pointed out, to assume that the silver question is dead so long as the masses of our people have votes to give is to say that they do not deserve to be free and that they ought to be slaves.

THE FIGHT FOR THE RIGHT.

Mr. President, both our great political parties admitted for years that the striking down of silver was a crime against humanity, and both declared in their platforms time after time that our nation was strong enough to undo the crime, and that its duty to its own people required it to do so. I do not mean that they so declared in terms, but that was the effect of their declarations. Yet, notwithstanding these declarations, no matter which political party succeeded in securing the votes of the people, nothing was ever done to restore silver. At last, in 1896, when the condition of the country had become deplorable, public interest was aroused to a pitch which demanded not only a decisive declaration by both political parties, but the nomination of candidates whose history and personality would insure that the declarations made would be crystallized into law. The Republican party was the first to meet in national convention in that year, and instead of meeting the just expectations of the people by an explicit statement affirming its former declarations, making good the professions of its leaders, and exemplifying its long and illustrious career as the champion of human rights, it ingloriously surrendered itself to the selfish interests against whose aggressions the people were clamoring, adopted a juggling and deceptive platform, and then nominated William McKinley thereon for President of the United States.

The Democratic party was the next to meet in convention, and never did a political party in this country more gloriously respond to the demands of an imperious situation or the just expectations of an insistent people. The note which was then struck vibrated with the accents of earnestness and truth, and the great leader put forth was himself an inspiration and a platform. More than that, that party pulled down from their high places and expelled from the Democratic temple the unfaithful stewards who had so long stood in its way and stultified its most solemn and binding declarations. It did that which few political parties in their decadence have ever had the power to do. It renewed its youth, rejuvenated itself, dedicated itself anew to the cause of liberty and humanity. It made itself again the party of Thomas Jefferson, and stepped into the shoes of the Republican party as the true exponent of the principles of Abraham Lincoln. Its action was so glorious that another political party, young, strong, and vigorous, and formed in despair at the faithlessness of the old parties, melted into its embrace and adopted its platform and its candidate; and hundreds of thousands of men who had never voted anything but the Republican ticket, moved by the manifest deception and trickery and chicane in their own party, of which they had long been tired and to which they had determined to no longer submit, let the scales drop from their eyes and sprang to the support of the standard erected by the loyalty and the courage and the conviction of a noble, an inspired, and a godlike Democracy.

It is not necessary to recount the struggle which followed. Everybody knows that the will of the people was defeated by force, by fraud, by intimidation, by corruption without parallel in the history of the country. But the gallant fight is to be renewed on the same lines and under the same leadership. And now that the Republican party has come out into the open, recanted even its hypocritical professions made at St. Louis, become the open advocate of all the industrial trusts, and made itself the father of the great monetary trust erected by the measures now pending and under consideration—the trust of trusts, which is to crush the lifeblood not out of labor alone, but out of every profession, avocation, and pursuit not allied to itself—who can doubt that the enlightened conscience of the nation will at last triumph over the force and fraud and corruption which before stood in its way and which will be again opposed to its just and humane demands?

Mr. President, I have here a discussion by Mr. Bryan upon the questions to which I have adverted in my remarks. Without reading it, I ask that it may be printed as part of my speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCOMAS in the chair). In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The paper referred to is as follows:

BANK-NOTE DESPOTISM.

[William J. Bryan in the New York Journal.]

The advocates of the gold standard have a double purpose: First, they desire to make gold the only legal tender for the payment of debts, public and private. I have discussed this question on former occasions and pointed out that the necessary effect of such a law would be to create a greater demand for gold, which would then be the only money legally available for the payment of debts, and thus aid the money-owning class and injure the wealth-producing class.

The second purpose of the advocates of the gold standard is to make bank notes the only credit money.

In response to your invitation, I beg to submit a few arguments in support of the greenback as against the bank note. The greenback is issued by the Government, and the volume of such money is determined by the people, acting through their representatives. The Supreme Court has held that such a money can be made a legal tender. When a man has greenbacks in his pocket he has money which is available for the payment of his debts; if he has bank notes, his money is only good when the creditor is willing to accept the money.

During the war, when gold and silver were at a premium, bank notes circulated on a level with greenbacks and were never worth any more; the reason being that national-bank notes are payable in lawful money, and the greenback being lawful money (and at that time the cheapest money) was used by the banks for the redemption of bank notes. It is interesting now to hear these same bankers, who redeemed bank notes in paper when gold and silver were at a premium of over a hundred per cent, talk about the dishonesty of a debtor, whether the debtor be an individual or the Government, who would redeem his obligations in anything but the dearest money.

The bank note has been good because it has had behind it the bonds and the greenbacks issued by the Government. If the greenback is good enough to stand behind the bank note, it is good enough to stand alone without any bank note in front of it.

A national-bank currency is objectionable because it is gross favoritism extended to a few. A bill reported by the House Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures in the last Congress provided:

First, that the Treasurer of the United States pay out gold coin in redemption of greenbacks and Treasury notes; second, that the Secretary of the Treasury have authority to issue gold bonds, drawing not more than 3 per cent, to secure the gold to maintain gold redemption; third, that national banks be allowed to deposit bonds and receive bank notes up to the par value of the bonds so deposited; fourth, that the tax on the national banks be reduced. If this plan goes into operation, the difference in its effect upon the individual and the national bank may be stated as follows: The greenbacks are to be retired and bonds issued. This will mean an increase in taxes to pay the interest upon the bonds. The individual who enjoys no special privileges will find his taxes increased, while the national bank, that enjoys special privileges, will find its tax diminished.

Second. If the individual buys a bond at par, he will lose the use of his money and must content himself with the 3 per cent interest. If a national bank invests its capital in bonds at par, it can deposit the bonds and secure bank notes to the face value of the bonds, thus securing a return of its investment, and in addition to that it can draw 3 per cent interest upon the bonds. In other words, the individual parts with his money and draws interest, while the national bank gets its money back and draws interest besides. The individual must eat his cake or keep it. The national bank both eats its cake and keeps it. This is favoritism that ought not to be tolerated in a government which recognizes the doctrine of equality before the law. The moment the Government begins to confer special privileges those in a position to profit by favoritism begin to clamor for legislation immediately in their interest, and as a result the instrumentalities of government are used for private gain and the true purpose of government forgotten.

There is another objection to the national-bank currency, namely, that the national banks are given control over the volume of credit money. Power to issue money should never be intrusted to private individuals or private corporations. Jefferson was an opponent of banks of issue, and in one of his letters declared that his opposition was so persistent that he had been denounced as a maniac by those bankers who desired to secure this privilege from the Government. Benton, in summing up the work of Jackson, gave emphasis to his fight with the national bank, and compared his work with the work of Cicero, saying that when he destroyed the bank conspiracy he saved America as Cicero had saved Rome by overthrowing the conspiracy of Cataline.

Wendell Phillips has so well described the danger of allowing private individuals to control the volume of money that I quote from a speech made by him a few years before his death:

"In other words, it was the currency which, rightly arranged, opened a nation's well springs, found work for willing hands to do, and filled them with a just return, while honest capital, daily larger and more secure, ministered to a glad prosperity. Or it was currency, wickedly and selfishly juggled, that made merchants bankrupt and starved labor into discontent and slavery, while capital added house to house and field to field, and gathered into its miserly hands all the wealth left in a ruined land.

"The first question, therefore, in an industrial nation is: Where ought control of the currency to rest? In whose hands can this almost omnipotent power be trusted? Every writer of political economy, from Aristotle to Adam Smith, allows that a change in the currency alters the price of every ounce and yard of merchandise and every foot of land. Whom can we trust with this despotism? At present the banks and the money kings wield this power. They own the yardstick, and can make it longer or shorter, as they please. They own every pound weight and can make it heavier or lighter as they choose. This explains the riddle, so mysterious to the common people, that those who trade in money always grow rich, even while those who trade in other things go into bankruptcy."

The third objection to national banks of issue is that the moment the national bank is permitted to issue money, that moment it becomes, for pecuniary reasons, the enemy of any Government paper.

The banks are now urging that the issue of paper money is a function of the banks and that the Government ought to go out of the banking business. Our answer is that the issue of money is a function of government and that the banks ought to go out of the governing business. The Government can not afford to build up a strong financial interest hostile to the exercise, by the Government, of the right to issue and control both the metallic and paper money of the nation.

Our national bank circulation rests upon Government bonds, and can not in amount exceed the total sum of bonds outstanding. Hence, if the banks are to supply an increasing amount of currency to meet the needs of increasing population and business, the national debt must perpetually increase.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, the legislation involved in the House financial bill and in the Senate substitute, as well as that which may be the outcome of a conference of the two Houses, it seems to me, is, after all that has been said, the naked triumph of that Democratic faction which in 1896 polled less than a quarter of a million of votes for the gold standard—in fact, only 133,554—while over 14,000,000 votes were cast for bimetallism.

Instead of this measure being legislation for the people, it is legislation against every expression of the public will. There has been no expression of the public opinion in this regard since that voiced in 1896 at the Presidential poll. Then nearly six and a half millions of Democratic voters declared for independent bimetallism; at the same time about 7,000,000 of Republicans declared for international bimetallism, and a beggarly 133,000 Gold Democrats voted, amid the derision of the people, for gold monometallism, not even, I believe, getting a precinct in the United States.

The stone which the builders rejected with scorn this Congress makes the corner stone of our financial superstructure; and that faction which, because of utter insignificance as a political factor, would have passed into absolute forgetfulness has been exalted into the directing force which has brought the Republican party to abandon bimetallism and establish the standard of gold monometallism, with all its attendant evil and depressing influences on the energies, the industries, the property, and the indebtedness of the people of these States.

As an illustration of the fact that a discredited Democratic faction blazed the way to the gold standard when the Republican party at St. Louis lost itself in the intricacies of international bimetallism, I will read an extract from the Indianapolis platform which, without a party behind or before it, has dictated the gold standard to the Republican party, and which again emphasizes the proverb that the tail may sometimes wag the dog:

Realizing these truths, demonstrated by long public inconvenience and loss, the Democratic party—

Meaning thereby the omnibus load which made up the Indianapolis convention, so called—

In the interest of the masses and of equal justice to all, practically established by the legislation of 1834 and 1853 the gold standard of monetary measurements.

If that is true history, then the "existing gold standard" of President McKinley's message antedates all Republican legislation, was of legal age when the crime of '73 was perpetrated; survived every law enacted since 1853; was unknown to the Supreme Court when the legal tendership of greenbacks was sustained; in fact, was hid from all the rest of the world except that "baker's dozen" of bolting Democrats which at Indianapolis laid down the lines which the Republican party have followed in their financial scheme.

A recapitulation of the arguments, facts, and statements which in 1896 convinced six and a half millions of the voters of this country that gold monometallism would follow the abandonment of bimetallism is not necessary, now that the fact has been accomplished, as evidenced by this bill under consideration. But from the advocates and supporters of this radical departure from the financial policy of bimetallism, which has been coeval with the establishment of the Federal Union, which is called for by no expression of the public voice, rendered necessary by no condition of the public business, but is interjected into our financial system at a time when its supporters have rendered themselves hoarse with acclaiming prosperity all over the land, we are entitled to know what existing public exigency calls for a change of financial policy against the expressed voice of 14,000,000 voters.

Yes, what is it that demands such legislation, and especially at this time? If, as you say, we are prosperous, why change the financial system of the country? An analysis of the original bill as it came to the Senate is now useful only as showing the animus of that portion of the Republican party which controls legislation at the other end of the Capitol. But for all practical purposes the original bill has been emasculated in the Committee on Finance of the Senate by its substitute proposing to draw the black line of criticism, if not condemnation, through every section by "striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the part printed in italics," as reported by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

But notwithstanding, the work and labor of a specially constituted Republican caucus committee, whose labor at the seashore and mountain resorts was heralded in the press during the summer and fall, is now black-lined by the Senate wing of the Republican party. A short and condensed analysis of the product of that labor may be of use in the future as a warning and example for the consideration of our reading and thinking people, and I give it in a brief way:

Section 1 of the now defunct House bill provided for the gold standard, repealed the silver-dollar unit of the legislation of those who founded the Government, and brought our country to the level of an imitator of the British standard and British finances.

Section 2 declared all bonds and other Federal obligations, whether issued already (ex post facto) or to be issued hereafter, to be payable, principal and interest, in gold; thus repealing the statutory provision of redemption in "coin" under which every obligation had been bought.

This House bill declares all greenbacks and Treasury notes to be redeemable only in gold, thus giving a black eye to silver.

It restricts silver certificates to denominations of one, two, and five dollars.

It creates a division of issue and redemption in the Treasury and practically reduces that great Department to a bank.

It establishes a permanent reserve fund of gold equal to 25 per cent of the total of greenbacks and Treasury notes outstanding.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain that reserve by selling 3 per cent gold bonds, running twenty years—swapping noninterest-bearing money for interest-bearing.

It prohibits the reduction of that general fund of the Treasury (for redemption of greenbacks and Treasury notes) below $50,000,000.

It redeems greenbacks and Treasury notes in gold, and authorized their reissue for gold only, and thus strikes down silver.

It provides for "parity" by a reserve fund to be created by the Secretary of the Treasury by exchange of gold for any other notes issued by the Treasury under this process and under this reliance. Will there be any "parity" money?

It receives subsidiary, worn or uncurrent coins for coinage and repealed all laws limiting the issue of such coins to $50,000,000.

It provides for a note currency to be issued by the Treasury in denominations of not less than $1, as the Secretary may prescribe. A reproduction of "shin-plasters" not expected at the opening of the twentieth century.

It increases the note issues of national banks by repealing the 90 per cent limit and authorizing an issue to the full par value of bonds deposited to secure circulation, a manifest help to speculators on the exchange, but of questionable aid to the people in their business.

It repeals the 1 per cent tax on national-bank circulation and requires a tax of only one-fifth of 1 per cent. This section and the preceding unite in increasing profits and diminishing taxes—but only to benefit national banks; all others must follow the old, old rule of taxes increasing as profits increase. Here under this bill taxes decrease as profits increase.

It authorizes the incorporation of small national banks of $25,000 capital in towns of 2,000 and over of population.

But, Mr. President, the House bill and all that long debate which followed elsewhere are overshadowed by this Senate substitute, which after weeks of debate in this Chamber will find its quietus in a conference report, the purport and scope of which no human intelligence can define. The substitute provides in section 1 that the gold standard is fixed, with a sort of mental reservation that it is not now new, but has been in existence, unknown to the people, since the enactment of section 3511 of the Revised Statutes, and this substitute only "continues" that "standard unit of values," and incidentally to maintain all forms of money at a "parity" with the unit standard of value, and to that end all Treasury obligations, issued under the act of July 14, 1890, shall be redeemed in gold.

This substitute establishes "a reserve fund of $150,000,000 in gold coin" for redemption purposes only.

This substitute makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to coin standard silver dollars, and with them to retire and cancel an equal amount of Treasury notes for that purpose only. But having by section 1 made 25.8 grains of gold the standard, it is somewhat confusing to ascertain of what the silver dollar is the standard in this section.

Mr. President, the manner in which the silver dollar, of whose usefulness and sacredness we have heard so much, was made a part of our coinage and how it came to be made the essential feature of our national currency is a matter that would doubtless interest, and I beg to give the incident as legendary lore, though it may be that years agone it appeared in Niles's Register. It is interesting not only for revealing the history of the making and adoption of our "dollar," but becomes more so because of the personality of those who stood godfathers at its birth.

Those two grand characters who figured so conspicuously in the formation of our Government, Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson, both members of the Cabinet of President Washington, were its sponsors. It is said that every morning when they came around the Cabinet board they were in the habit of sitting on opposite sides of the table, like two game cocks when gaffed and trimmed and put into a pit ready for battle; that especially upon all matters relating to the police regulations and the respective jurisdictional powers of the States and the General Government they were constantly antagonistic, but that there was one question upon which they agreed, and that question was the money of the country.

The story relates how those two distinguished gentlemen were appointed by the President in 1792 a committee, so to speak, for the purpose of seeing what should be the "dollar of account," what should be "the unit of value" in this country; what should be the system of weights, and what of measurement. Those gentlemen, with alacrity and great painstaking, attended to their duty, and they first established the yard stick according to the English rule, adopting the old metallic yard stick, which had been in use long in England and kept in the exchequer with gold tips, which, when measured at a certain temperature Fahrenheit between the gold tips, would measure exactly 36 inches. They adopted that as the standard of measurement.

Then, as to the pound weight, they adopted that in use in England, saying a pound was a pound, whether of lead or of iron or of feathers. They agreed as to these, but had some trouble when they came to make money—this dollar, this almighty dollar, as it is sometimes called. When they came to the consideration of that question they invited into consultation two gentlemen, Mr. Bowdrich and Mr. Rittenhouse, who were practical business men and understood all the transactions of every-day business life.

These gentlemen were called in. They sent for an assayer, and finally decided on getting 1,000 Spanish milled dollars of different dates of coinage for an experiment. At that time Spain was not what she is now. She was a great power, was in the vanguard of nations, and her money went abroad to a greater extent than that of any other nation. Her money was used in Mexico and South America, as well as in other places; it was current here; not only so, but the Spanish milled dollar was then the predominant money in this country and had been in colonial days.

It was then agreed, advising with these eminent business men, Bowdrich and Rittenhouse, that in order to arrive at what should constitute a dollar they would make an experimental test. They agreed that they would get 1,000 Spanish milled dollars of different dates and have them thoroughly cleansed of all extraneous matter, and have an assayer take them, melt them down, and extract all the alloy therefrom in their presence. So they took a thousand Spanish milled dollars thus prepared and had them melted and had this residuum weighed. They then divided that residuum by 1,000 and the product of that division thus ascertained was exactly 371¼ grains of pure silver, and they made that 371¼ grains the "dollar of account," the "unit of value," and it has been so ever since.

From the time of the adoption of that standard, April 2, 1792, this country has grown into a vast area, with untold strength and wealth and capabilities and all that constitutes true greatness. Since the 2d of April, 1792, this dollar has stood the test of the storm of wars, of politics, and of revolution, and that dollar still maintained its value until the assassin struck it, by stealth, in 1873, and its veritable ghost has lingered on the stage of action since and will not down at the bidding; and now its former friends, with this bill, seek to give it the finishing stroke and put it out of the way by a statutory burial.

That seems to have been the condition, and it was so stated in the various resolutions which were adopted here and in party platforms until we were informed by the President of the United States in his recent message that the gold standard is the "existing" standard in this country. He adopts, then, the principle which was enunciated in the Indianapolis platform of going back to 1853.

Mr. President, this is the condition which surrounded the almighty dollar. I shall not enter upon any eulogy of that dollar; but it has sacredness and purity. The question has been debated over and over again, yet we have a respect for it; and now, when a doubt exists in the popular mind as to whether the gold standard really exists or not, we have here a bill introduced by the party which is predominant not only through its thousands of officials throughout the country, but predominant in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, and controls the executive department, all adhering to the doctrine that we must have the gold standard. The question is, Will it be of benefit or injury to the people of this country? I shall have something to say about that, Mr. President; but before I do I wish to proceed a little further in reference to the silver dollar.

England, as has been stated by my friend on my right, who has just addressed the Senate [Mr. TURNER], did away with her silver and demonetized it in 1816. The other day I heard a remark made by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] which struck me with force. He said that he defied any man to show him any great country that was known to the history of the enlightened world which had adopted the single gold standard which was not injured by the adoption of that standard.

In furtherance of this idea I had occasion to look into some statistics, which are startling. Cast your eye for a moment to that great power, England, which seems to be the head and front of this offense, and contrast for a moment the former and present condition of the subjects of that Kingdom—Empire. To say nothing of her crushed and starving millions in India, from whom she a few years since took even the right to coin, in a small way, silver money, go to her boastful island itself and see the former and present condition of her bone and sinew, the laboring population.

In 1816 England demonetized silver. That was the first great power we know of in modern times, at least, which had taken such action; and when she did it, what was her condition? Turn to the statistics, and you will find that 60 per cent of her laboring population, the plain people, as Mr. Lincoln called them, were the owners of their own homes and lived under their own rooftree.

Look there again, twenty years later, and an examination of the statistics will show that, instead of 60 per cent, there were only 40 per cent who owned their own homes under the grinding centralizing power of the single gold standard, and from that time on during every decade the per cent of ownership of homes has lessened, until now you can rarely find a man who labors for his bread—the man who tills the soil, or the man who works in the great factories in the cities—who is the owner of the house in which he lives. Such has been the inroad, such has been the course and curse of the single gold standard.

It is centralizing in its power; it makes the rich richer and the poor poorer. That has been the history everywhere of the single gold standard, and it will in the future, when our population becomes more dense, be so with us. Therefore, we ought, with all the power within us, strive to maintain our silver dollar with its 371¼ grains, as adopted by Jefferson and Hamilton, with the aid of Rittenhouse and Bowdrich. Let us hold to it, Mr. President, as to an anchor of safety.

Again, look at France. While all this was going on in England, impoverishing the people and taking away from them their homes, go across the fretful English Channel into France, and what do you see? You see upon the sunny banks of the Seine, where nature smiles in beauty, and upon the vine-clad hills of the Rhone, where the grape clusters and yields to the wine press its imprisoned sweets—go there, and what do you find? There almost every man owns his own home and sleeps under his own rooftree and cultivates his own garden and vineyard, and there is no one to molest or make him afraid.

They are small farmers as a general thing, and when trouble came, when the storm of war came with its angry clouds bursting upon them, when the hordes of Germany were thundering at the gates of Paris in 1870, with the cry of "Væ victis," demanding millions in coin or blood, what did they do? They did that which no other people on earth could have done in so short a time—paid the milliards as a ransom of their capital, and paid most of it in silver coin. Those owners of their own homes drew from their pockets and the women from their stockings the silver coins which thrift and economy had, under the silver Latin Union then in vogue in France, enabled them to lay aside for a rainy day. They were then free from the grinding power of a single gold standard.

Now, I might cite other countries to illustrate this, but am content not to extend my criticism further in this direction than to place, as I have, in contrast, these two great European powers. It shows that when a nation demonetizes silver and establishes the single gold standard it disturbs the proper business relations, giving advantage to money over labor, and enriches the one and impoverishes the other.

I have, Mr. President, rather parenthetically gone out of the line of what I intended to say; but to resume my criticism, this substitute of which I am speaking also provides for deposit of gold coins and the issue therefor of gold certificates.

I believe the first bill that was framed and given out touching this very vital question was prepared by a select committee of Republicans in vacation, which was presented to the House Republican caucus and discussed by it and molded into the shape of the House bill now before us; which in turn has been superseded by the substitute of the Senate Finance Committee, which is also before us for discussion. It will be observed that in each and every bill the destruction of silver money as a standard and the establishing of gold as a single standard, together with the conversion of coin bonds into gold bonds, are leading features. Indeed, they are the essentials in each bill, and should be so regarded.

The House bill passed the House by Republican votes, and the Senate substitute, differing in some respects from it, will doubtless pass the Senate substantially in its present form by Republican votes, bringing about, as no doubt originally designed by their authors, a conflict which will result in throwing the House bill and Senate substitute into a committee of conference of the two Houses, and this is the diplomatic condition, no doubt, intended from the beginning of this discussion in which to place this contention. In this conference committee such changes will be made as the power behind the throne may desire, and on this report the final issue will rest. In this report the danger lies—the main features, if not the form, of this report are doubtless already understood by the controlling spirits of the Republicans in the Congress, and will finally work out, as originally designed, under party discipline. My grave fears are that it will pass in an ugly form and be detrimental to the rights and interests of our people.

It—this substitute—provides against the issue of United States notes and Treasury notes in denominations less than $10, and for the cancellation of all such notes of less than $10 when received in the Treasury and also that silver certificates shall not be issued for more than $10, and all such certificates of greater value than $10 shall be canceled when received in the Treasury, thus decreasing the circulation, for an increase of which there is so much demand.

The substitute also provides for further issues of Government bonds to be exchanged for outstanding bonds. That is a most startling proposition. Why, I ask, should that be done, converting them into gold and giving, as I shall show, longer life to the banks? Mr. President, why is this done? Why is it necessary at this time, when they say that prosperity abounds in the land? Why, at a time when the President in his message tells us we are paying gold in all of our transactions, is it necessary to place upon the statute books that which will condemn the silver of the country and result in the issue of bonds that will be payable, principal and interest, in gold? I have heard no sensible reason, and I think none can be given.

But there is a reason which is behind the scene. It is under the curtain and you can not see it exactly, but it is so. What power was it that brought this bill about? Was it not the national banks of this country? No sensible man denies that fact. What was the situation of the banks then before the issuance of the bonds by Mr. Cleveland in 1894-95, amounting to $162,000,000? Let me read for a moment from the Treasury report. We had then and have now how many bonds?

The amount of bonds outstanding July 1, 1896, was as follows: Four and a half per cent bonds continued at 2 per cent, $25,000,000; 4 per cent bonds of 1907, $559,000,000; 5 per cent bonds of 1904, $100,000,000. Then come the Cleveland bonds—4 per cent bonds—$162,000,000; that is all. It makes about $847,000,000. It is known to every intelligent man, especially those who have read with care the bank act under which the national banks are now doing business, that the banks are required to have money issued only at 90 per cent on the dollar. They could not go beyond that. This bill provides that it shall go to the full face value of the bonds.

It was essentially provided in this law that they should take these bonds of the United States—not State bonds or corporation bonds, but bonds of the United States—upon which they are to base their operations, and which are liable for any forfeiture or any failure to meet the obligations of that bank in any form. That now is essential. They had, exclusive of the Cleveland bonds, $685,000,000. How many banks are there in the United States? More than 3,500, with a paid-in capital of more than $605,000,000. So when the bonds due in 1907 are taken up, there will be but little left to bank on. They could not get a sufficiency of bonds, and the banks are increased in number and enlarged as our country builds up and the business demands it. Therefore more bonds were necessary in order to sustain the banks and give them a safe basis of operation, or an additional capital upon which they might do business. Therefore the banks must have more bonds.

I shall not, even by intimation, accuse Mr. Cleveland of doing that demanded by the interests of the banks when he issued the $162,000,000 of bonds, but nevertheless it so operated that it gave additional strength to them. Mark you, the point to which I wish to especially direct the attention of the Senate is that these bonds expire by their own limitation in 1904 and 1907—and they are all coin bonds, every one of them. They all expire then except the bonds issued by Mr. Cleveland expiring in 1925.

There are then of the bonds which fall due in 1904, $100,000,000; they are 5 per cent bonds. There are also $559,000,000 of bonds which fall due in 1907, and there are only $25,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds. They extended these last-named bonds by grace; they have been continued over; they are overdue and are retained by the holders at 2 per cent. There are $25,000,000 of those. I do not know whether they are subject to use as sources of bank circulation or not. I suppose, as they are overdue, they are not. Including the Cleveland bonds there were only $847,000,000 subject to being used as a basis for banking operations. Take the $162,000,000 off, and you have only about $685,000,000 upon which the banks can operate, and nearly all those will be due in 1907.

Now, the banks see that they would have to go out of business in 1904 and 1907 unless there is a new supply of bonds. There have been a hundred and ninety-eight million dollars of bonds issued during the Spanish war by the President which might be operated upon, but five hundred and fifty-nine million will go out in 1907 unless renewed, and this would leave the amount required insufficient and the banks would have comparatively nothing to operate upon. They must either quit business or convert their bonds into those of longer life.

They seek in this bill to renew the life of the bonds. They make it a bond for twenty-five or thirty years longer. It is the renewal and extension of the life of the bonds they are after, so that the national banks of this country may flourish under existing laws. That is, in my opinion, one of the main secrets of this bill. The banks are at the back and bottom of it. They are, doubtless, instigating those who have fashioned the bill in this shape. That is not in the interest of the main body of the people of this country.

I object to national banks for various reasons. They are the greatest of centralizers, and one of the great dangers to this country is centralization. Yes, sir, it is going on and on, and through the instrumentality of national banks in part it is being done, and another mode by which this centralizing movement is being effected is the establishment of one money metal instead of retaining both silver and gold.

The authors and promoters of this bill have the power in the House; they have it in the Senate; they have the Executive. All official influences are upon their side, and I believe that the Executive will approve the bill, should it pass, notwithstanding the President has been regarded as a self-announced bimetallist. Legislation in favor of enlarging and extending the powers of national banks ought to be checked.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the substitute also provides for increasing the issue of national-bank notes to the par value of bonds deposited to secure circulation. It reduces the taxation of national banks from 1 per cent to one-fourth of 1 per cent each half year, or one-half of 1 per cent yearly—that is, one-half as much as the present law requires.

I observe no provision in the substitute for smaller national banks. If allowed at all, they should be allowed in the country as well as towns and crossroads if wanted and the law conformed to, and not concentrate them in cities, as this bill does, with large capital, thus centralizing financial power.

It is surprising that the initiation of a monetary policy thus fraught with so many departures from the principles and precedents of more than a century of our financial history should have been accompanied with a panic in the stock markets little less disastrous than that which made "Black Friday" a memorable day on our financial calendar, so much so that the Secretary of the Treasury, whether rightfully or wrongfully, did go to the relief of the bankers of New York and, as they boastfully say, relieved their panic, showing that when you undertake to establish the gold standard and to exclude silver from circulation and lessen your currency, as this bill does, the very motion excites the alarm of the speculators and the money dealers of the country and precipitates a panic.

But these national banks, permit me to say, have the absolute power to precipitate a panic at any time. The touch of an electric button in New York will get its response in a half hour or less from San Francisco upon the Pacific coast, and between them there can be a panic precipitated on the country. We are putting ourselves in the power of the banks, and they can give flush times or hard times at will. We should legislate against any such power.

Thus at the first serious intimation that the Congress intended to abandon every promise made on the platforms of both political parties and inaugurate a standard of value on the principle of a single money of ultimate redemption, we see developed in the money exchanges a storm center from which came the cyclone which swept away the values which the alleged prosperity was represented to have firmly established. It did it almost in a day, to a very large amount.

Thus the very first appearance of gold monometallism in this Congress was accompanied with the rumbling and threatening of the return of one of those cycles of business adversity which follow close on the heels of factitious prosperity. And the settlement of accounts on the 31st of December, 1899, was overshadowed by the "slump" in the prices of all investments, whether of a permanent or speculative character.

Mr. President, if "coming events cast their shadow before," the factitious prosperity upon which so many hopes have been founded may prove to be the hectic flush and not the ruddy glow of returning health to the body politic. The enormous expenditure of the Government incident to the war with Spain, as well as those which keep pace with our Army in the Philippines, has stimulated some business enterprises and given an impetus to trade in certain lines without spreading prosperity over the States. A rise in all prices followed by a general advance in values of property are the indicia of genuine prosperity, but a partial rise of prices in certain articles, with stagnation in the values of property, imposes a higher cost of living without providing the means of meeting its demands.

Five years after the crime of '73 had been perpetrated, and when it was in the green and tender state, Mr. Blaine said:

I believe the struggle now going on in this country and in other countries for a single gold standard would, if successful, produce widespread disaster in the end throughout the commercial world.

That, my fellow-Senators, on the other side of this Chamber, is not the expression of the conviction of a Democrat; it is not the prophecy of a Populist, but the well-considered judgment of the man who was in his lifetime the leader, the Henry Clay, of the Republican party, and whose words were the golden apples for which Republicans scrambled over each other on every utterance.

If Mr. Blaine could revisit the "glimpses of the moon" that struck the Republican party when it formulated this financial policy, what would he say? One can only infer from what he predicted of legislation like this that—

The destruction of silver as money and establishing gold as the sole unit of value—

Exactly what the bill does—

must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property, except those investments which yield a fixed return in money. These would be enormously enhanced in value and would gain a disproportionate and unfair advantage over every other species of property.—Congressional Record, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, volume 7, part 1, page 821.

When those words were uttered by Mr. Blaine there was no greater political insult that could be offered to Republican or Democrat than to charge him with being a "Gold Bug."

At the same time that Mr. Blaine uttered the language I have quoted, the Republican party in Congress further enacted what are known as the Stanley Matthews resolutions, in the Forty-fifth Congress, which were as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 22.

Whereas by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it is provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment, in coin, or its equivalent, of all interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same shall be paid in lawful money or other than gold and silver; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin at the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semiannually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payment," approved January 11, 1875, are required to be of the same description of bonds of the United States described in said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt;" and

Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value at that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,'" to be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sum whatever.

I will read the resolution itself; it is short; it is very clear, and, if carried out, perhaps no resolution which has been introduced in Congress in modern times could have more effect:

Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under said act of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States, containing 412½ grains of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

Language could not be put together stronger or more clear and conclusive. Not only that, but the Republicans indorsed the bill in the Senate and in the House, and those who were present voted with him upon this question; and it has been said here, and I believe truthfully said, that you can not find a leader or a man who posed as a leader of the Republican party to-day or since that time who has not indorsed at one time or another in full that resolution and who has not been in favor of the remonetization of silver and opposed to its demonetization. They were always opposed to the issue of gold bonds in every instance.

The Republicans voted against issuing bonds and gave as the reason that they did not want to issue gold bonds, but coin bonds. Mr. Cleveland some years ago sent the figures to us, who were then in the Senate and House, showing that he could give us $16,000,000 advantage by way of interest if he had authority to issue gold bonds, and they refused to do it then. The Republicans as well as Democrats refused to do it. Why? Because they did not want gold bonds. That is the reason. Yet now, presto, change! we find our Republican friends on the other side advocating not only the issuing of gold bonds but making gold the single standard.

The declared policy of the United States by those resolutions of Congress was to strengthen the public credit by declaring that all bonds were payable in coin, and that such payment in silver dollars was not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of any right of the public creditor. I come now to the act to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, that act in which we all figured here and in reference to which we remained so long in our secret caucuses on each side, and when we, the two parties, were balanced in this Chamber almost to a man and all these troubles came upon us (in 1893) and for which many politicians, on our Democratic side at least, have been condemned for voting to repeal the Sherman law, Tennessee presenting two or three notable instances; for the Democratic voters there have always been for silver having equal rights with gold and not for a single gold standard.

Politicians, under the influence of an Administration remarkable for its strong personnel, seeking patronage from it and receiving now and then a little taffy that flatters vanity, do sometimes go too far in trying to keep in with the Administration and are forgetful of the rights of their constituents and subsequently are condemned by the people for so doing. No one remembers all those troubles in 1893 more than the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], whom I see before me, and justly one of the leaders of his party then and now, as do other Senators present among our friends the enemy, on the other side of this Chamber.

So, as late as 1893, when repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act of 1890, it was again declared "to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money" as well for the bondholder as for the citizens. Then the policy of the Republican party was to "strengthen the public credit" by paying bonds in silver. Now, the financial scheme under consideration, whatever form it may take, proposes to change the public policy of all previous legislation, and by that change in redemption from "coin" or silver dollars to gold, to give to the present holders of bonds that increase in value which gold has over silver.

What magic words! Four little letters—to substitute one for the other—what difference it makes! "Coin" has four letters; "gold" has four letters. Substitute one for the other, and what does it do? It puts $60,000,000, according to Mr. MCCLELLAN, of New York, into the pockets of the bondholders as a bonus. That is what the change of these four little letters from coin to gold means. Substitute one for the other, as in this wicked bill, and you see the result. I am against such a change. I do not believe it best and proper for the country in its commercial, social, and business relations, or in any other way that will benefit the vast mass of taxpayers and consumers who constitute the bone and sinew of our country.

As said, it has been estimated to amount to $60,000,000 (by Mr. MCCLELLAN of New York, in the House of Representatives) alone upon the issue of bonds maturing in 1925. Those are the Cleveland bonds, a handsome present, I may say, to the bondholders, taken from the pockets of the people; $60,000,000 that could be saved by keeping in the word "coin" instead of taking it out and putting in the word "gold." There are sometimes certain policies and there are certain other policies embodied in the same movement. One of our misfortunes is that we can not always see the bottom of the well. There are policies that are open and aboveboard, but there are others which we can not see and can not find until too late.

Never before in the history of the country did any political party so openly abandon the policy of "strengthening the public credit" for one increasing the profit of corporations. That is what this bill does for corporations and especially for banks. It is worthy of note that the Stanley Matthews resolution not only made the bonds redeemable in coin, but made coin synonymous with silver dollars, and recited those separate acts of Congress in support of the provisions of those resolutions, viz., the act of March 18, 1869; the act of July 14, 1870, and the act of January 11, 1875, each and all of which made the financial policy of the country to be understood as declaring silver the equal of gold as money of redemption for Government obligations.

This resolution is in keeping with the Constitution. "Coin" is the word used in the Constitution, and that instrument itself interprets the meaning of "coin" when it says no State shall have a legal tender in payment of debts but gold and silver—not one alone, but both—and makes no distinction between them.

I do not understand why the constitutional point could not be made upon this matter, for you can not by act of Congress destroy silver as a full and complete debt payer in the States. The Constitution itself forbids it. You have to do away with a portion of the Constitution before you can destroy it. Any debt in any State can be paid in silver as a legal tender, for the Constitution says a State shall make nothing but silver and gold legal tender.

The profit which Mr. MCCLELLAN estimated for the bonds maturing in 1925 applies equally to all of the United States bonds now outstanding, which are—

4½ per cent bonds, continued at 2 per cent	$25,364,500
4 per cent bonds due 1907	559,636,850
4 per cent bonds due 1925	162,315,400
4 per cent Spanish war bonds	198,000,000

Thus over $1,000,000,000 of bonds, payable by their terms in coin, have been appreciated in value to the holders by percentage varying from 15 to 25 per cent.

You will find that the time will not be very long before some of these other bonds will be issued. I doubt very much if it will be before the ides of next November, for reasons best known to the Republican party; but you will find that the remainder of the $400,000,000 of bonds that are authorized will be issued, and they must be gold bonds then, under this law, if you pass it.

This financial scheme not only mortgages the resources of the people of this country to pay gold bondholders a profit not "nominated in the bond," but adds to that unnecessary burden that of redeeming in gold $98,026,280 Treasury notes issued under the Sherman law of July 14, 1890, as well as the greenbacks legal tenders, amounting to $346,681,016, together aggregating $435,707,269. And further, the Secretary of the Treasury, by either wing of this financial policy—the House bill or the Senate substitute—may, in his discretion, redeem silver dollars and silver certificates in gold by a roundabout process, and that notwithstanding Treasury Circular No. 123, of 1896, declares, in substance, that—

Silver dollars, standard coins of the United States, are not redeemable.

Why are they not redeemable? Simply because they are standard, and being a standard, you can not redeem them, for they already stand at the highest point. The language used in that Treasury circular is:

Gold coins and standard silver dollars, being standard coins of the United States, are not redeemable.

But, Mr. President, the advocates of this bill say they will go on and coin some of these silver dollars and that the bill proposes to do it. Well, I may very pertinently ask, For how long can that last? Do you provide by this bill the right to purchase silver or in any other way to prepare to coin it, as was formerly done? Do you let the owners of silver go and submit it to the mint to be coined free, or by paying for doing it? No. Do you propose to keep a supply by any means whatever? No. Then, just as soon as you exhaust the little amount of silver you have on hand, no more standard silver dollars can be made.

"Silver certificates are receipts for standard silver dollars deposited and are redeemable in such dollars only" until this financial scheme makes them exchangeable by the hocus-pocus of its "division of issue and redemption," in House bill, or its "reserve fund" or its "general fund of the Treasury," in the Senate substitute. Every provision of the scheme runs to the advantage and profit of the bondholders, who are the stockholders of the national banks.

The criticism of President Cleveland by Mr. McKinley on the tendency of the former toward all that was harmful in financial policy reveals the inconsistencies of men and parties when in the evolutions of politics they abandon pledges and principle.

I have the highest respect personally for the President of the United States, Mr. McKinley, but he is but mortal, and sometimes he makes mistakes. Anyhow, he was upon one side of this question some eight or nine years ago and is now on the other. I make a witness of him now as to the correctness of our position to-day and the error that the other side of this Chamber are making when they pursue the course that they have marked out in this bill.

Mr. McKinley said at Toledo, Ohio, in February, 1891, not so long ago, but long after the act of 1853, which, it is said, did away with silver and established gold as the standard—I will read what Mr. McKinley said, and I tell you this is very sharp criticism. It is not exactly personal, and it is not that which ought to be stricken from the speech of a Senator because it is scandalous or too personal, but, my fellow-Senators, it is about as strong and rough as language can be used against the policy which you are pursuing here, and it is by the chief of your party, the President of the United States. Here it is. I read it:

During all of Grover Cleveland's years at the head of the Government he was dishonoring one of your precious metals—one of your own products—discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold. He endeavored, even before his inauguration into office—to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and even afterwards and to the end of his Administration persistently used his power to that end.

Mr. Cleveland did, says Mr. McKinley—

He used his power to that end. Does anyone dare say that the President is not now using his power to that end? You will see when this bill is presented to him whether he will approve it or not. I believe he will. It is the very same thing which this Administration is now doing along the same line. Continuing, Mr. McKinley said:

He [Cleveland] was determined to contract the circulating medium and to demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce, and therefore dear.

That is the language Mr. McKinley applied to Mr. Cleveland when President, and pray is he, President McKinley, not now doing the same thing in a more aggressive and objectionable form? Mr. McKinley continues in the same censorious style:

He [Cleveland] would have increased the value of money and diminished the value of everything else—money the master, everything else the servant. He was not thinking of "the poor" then. He had left their side. He was not standing forth in their defense. Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money. The sponsor and promoter of those professing to stand guard over the welfare of the poor and lowly.

But the finish of this has the most poisonous sting to it. He concludes his tirade on President Cleveland in the following terse, pungent, and epigrammatic style:

Was there ever more inconsistency or reckless assumption?

I answer, Never!—until this Administration and this financial policy became the pet scheme of President McKinley and his Administration, when the "mote" in the eye of Grover Cleveland became the "beam" in that of Mr. McKinley.

Mr. McKinley in 1891 was the ardent advocate of silver, the passionate defender of bimetallism, the earnest opponent of demonetization of silver; but he has lived and learned to follow the footsteps and adopt the measures of Grover Cleveland. In his last message I find this extract, which Grover Cleveland might have written without the least recantation of previous opinions or the least ground for any charge of inconsistency:

I urgently recommend that to support the existing gold standard—

Was the gold standard less "existing" then than it was when the Toledo speech was made?—

I urgently recommend that to support the existing gold standard, and to maintain "the parity in value of the coins of the two metals (gold and silver) and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the market and in the payment of debts," the Secretary of the Treasury be given additional power and charged with the duty to sell United States bonds and to employ such other effective means as may be necessary to these ends. The authority should include the power to sell bonds on long and short time, as conditions may require, and should provide for a rate of interest lower than that fixed by the act of January 14, 1875.

While there is now no commercial fright which withdraws gold from the Government, but, on the contrary, such widespread confidence that gold seeks the Treasury, demanding paper money in exchange, yet the very situation points to the present as the most fitting time to make adequate provision to insure the continuance of the gold standard and of public confidence in the ability and purpose of the Government to meet all its obligations in the money which the civilized world recognizes as the best. The financial transactions of the Government are conducted upon a gold basis. We receive gold when we sell United States bonds and use gold for their payment. We are maintaining the parity of all the money issued or coined by authority of the Government. We are doing these things with the means at hand. Happily at the present time we are not compelled to resort to loans to supply gold. It has been done in the past, however, and may have to be done in the future.

It behooves us, therefore, to provide at once the best means to meet the emergency when it arises, and the best means are those which are the most certain and economical. Those now authorized have the virtue neither of directness nor economy. We have already eliminated one of the causes of our financial plight and embarrassment during the years 1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896. Our receipts now equal our expenditures; deficient revenues no longer create alarm. Let us remove the only remaining cause by conferring the full and necessary power on the Secretary of the Treasury and impose upon him the duty to uphold the present gold standard and preserve the coins of the two metals on a parity with each other, which is the repeatedly declared policy of the United States.

In this connection I repeat my former recommendations that a portion of the gold holdings shall be placed in a trust fund from which greenbacks shall be redeemed upon presentation, but when once redeemed shall not thereafter be paid out except for gold.

Mr. President, every great Republican party leader throughout the political course of that party has been the opponent of the gold standard, the supporter of bimetallism, the friend of greenbacks and Treasury notes, and not one would recognize their ideas of Republican finance in this bankers' bill for the establishment of gold monometallism.

What does this financial scheme, whether of the House or Senate, do for any other interest than that of corporate and accumulated wealth? There is not a feature in any section of either House bill or Senate substitute that carries a sympathetic note to the hardships and sufferings of any but those capable of reciprocating favors when the Presidential election comes around. The great farming and planting interests of the people in many of the States have experienced the rise in the prices of nearly all they have to buy without receiving any increase in the prices for what they must sell. They witness their products swelling the volume of their country's exports, but they do not realize any increased returns to their purses.

The gold standard acts "after the fact," so far as farmers are concerned. It may swell the profits of speculators in grain, tobacco, wheat, meats, cotton, rice, and other agricultural products, but it brings no help or relief to the agriculturist. It may hold out to the speculator the blessing of a 100-cent dollar, but it keeps for the producer the 50-cent dollar, supported only on the promise of "parity," and how long, pray, will that promise be kept? How long will that promise be kept when there is nothing to provide for a sufficient amount of money to do the business of the country?

In this financial scheme we have the abandonment of the promises and pledges of maintaining bimetallism made on many party platforms and avowed with solemn protestation in every Republican speech. The pledge of "parity" rests on no greater sanctity than that on which the maintenance of bimetallism was solemnly given. How long will the pledge of parity be kept? It can be abandoned by the repeal of the law, and it will be abandoned when the powers behind this bill make that demand. Parity and gold monometallism can not live together in the same monetary system. It requires two metals of standard value in order that parity may exist.

If you take this away from silver, how can you have parity? Their separation will not be compelled prior to the next Presidential election, but with the return to power of a Republican Administration and Congress the divorce a mensa et thoro will follow.

Mr. President, the only hope for silver as a money of ultimate redemption rested on the possibility of free coinage by the United States. That hope this financial scheme destroys certainly for a time, and it is too much to expect that gold monometallism will long carry the burden of "parity" with a depreciated coinage. The hour when parity will be abandoned will come and come quickly after the reelection of a Republican President and Congress, should that occur; and parity repealed, the holders of silver and silver certificates will realize the loss, while the more prudent speculators, always alive and alert, will pocket the profits of the gold standard.

The silver certificates float only on the promise of parity, and that exists only in the statutes, repealable by Congress; and with another Republican Congress and Executive the power behind this bill will assert its authority and compel the full fruition of gold monometallism.

I am one of those who believe that silver is not dead. It seems that you may strike it down, and yet, like the antique wrestler, in the olympian contests, it rises the greater for the fall. Silver belongs to the people; it is domestic; it is the friend of the poor; it is the handmaid of charity; it belongs to commerce; it belongs to the world; it is recognized by our Constitution; it was given us by God; and, sir, we can not strike it down so that it will not rise again. Whenever hard times come, when speculations have run rife in this country, leaving, as is generally done, a charred and blackened track, and the people have become embarrassed and disheartened, then they willturn about, and, remembering what virtue there is in silver, will bring it back again, through the ballot box, and renew this battle for silver. It has not been dead in the last few years. It is not dead now. You can not kill silver. It has a God-given life. It is more useful than gold. It sleeps in the same mountains with gold, is found in the same rocky bed and will not remain separated. There must be bimetallism. It is necessary for the success of the commerce of this country, as for all its business and social relations.

Gold monometallism, "the standard of the most enlightened nations," that is the phrase of the Republican platform which concealed the purpose now avowed in this financial scheme to abandon bimetallism. There has been some dispute in the public press as to the authorship of that platform. I will not speak at length upon it, but whoever he may be he illustrates again that art of Talleyrand which employs words only to conceal purpose. So long as the United States maintained by parity two metals in its currency it was, according to the Republican platform, outside of the enlightened nations.

So, in order to bring us within that pale, this Administration perpetrated that practical joke of an international silver conference, at which France united with the United States in the agreement as to silver, and the joke took a serious outlook. But England saved the day for gold monometallism, and bimetallism was found to be no longer practicable, since the most "enlightened nation," Old Mother England, refused to unite in maintainingsilver on an equality with gold.

The single standard of gold had been her policy for more than half a century, and under its operation the world—all other enlightened nations—had become her debtors and she could see no reason for reducing the standard of the money in which the debts owing to her must be paid. So this Republican Administration and Congress, having pretended toward a conference for international bimetallism and England not agreeing, they promptly abandoned every pledge and promise of their platforms except that of following in the footsteps and imitating the policy of England, and this financial scheme is the outcome and fruit of that international bimetallic conference, and abandons bimetallism and puts the United States as a "second best" to England in the race for gold monometallism.

The State Department of this Administration is reported in the public press to have secured the cooperation of the most enlightened nations in keeping "open" the trade doors of China, where silver is the only money known and used, while gold is merely an article of commerce: and when the merchant from the United States enters that "open door," he must sell by weight the golden dollars of our currency for the silver pieces of the Chinese.

Have you thought of that? When we go to China with our money we have to sell the gold by weight, because they have only silver coin there. Whether that barter of our gold currency will help our commerce is to be ascertained only on trial.

This experiment of gold monometallism has therefore no sanction in the public will, no precedent in party politics, no support in the conditions of trade, business, and commerce, no reason in the state of our finances, and no justifiable cause in the alleged prosperity of the people. What, then, has brought it about?

While the people had voted almost solidly against gold monometallism, as I have shown, there was a potent influence, small and insignificant in numbers, but powerful in its "pull" on political parties, which demanded its "pound of flesh" cut from the very heart of the people. By this financial scheme all Government bonds heretofore made redeemable in "coin" are made redeemable hereafter in gold, and now the essence and doctrine of the Indianapolis convention is adopted by the Republicans.

If that change in the character of redemption creates an increase in the value of the bonds, by what authority and on what principles of finance was that increase in value given to the holders of bonds already bought on a coin basis? What sound reason existed for making a present of that increase in the value of the bonds to the present holders?

But two Congresses past the President, Mr. Cleveland, asked for authority to issue gold bonds on the plea that many millions of dollars would be saved to the Treasury. And notwithstanding the country was to have the advantage of that increase in value, the country and the Congress refused Mr. Cleveland the authority to issue gold bonds. It was then stated that a 3 per cent gold bond would net the Treasury as much and perhaps more than a 4 per cent coin bond, but the Congress refused the temptation because it was a step in the direction of gold monometallism, and the Republicans voted against it, as well as did the Democrats.

Not for the profit of sixteen and a half million dollars, which a change from coin to gold would have earned the Treasury on a scale of $65,000,000 of 3 per cent gold bonds, would the Congress or the people take the initial step toward gold monometallism. The Republican party in the House of Representatives, in the debate on resolution No. 275, on the 14th of February, 1895, appealed to the following provisions of its platforms as reasons why it would not vote to issue a gold bond, and I want no better reason than they give themselves. In 1888 that party declared that—

> The Republican party is in favor of the use of gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration—> in its efforts to demonetize silver.

That was said in the House of Representatives by Republicans. In 1892 it declared:

> The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of gold and silver as money.

These extracts from party platforms were read on the floor of the House by the floor leader of the Republican party as "the declarations of our (Republican) party, and, Mr. Speaker, as one faithful to this party declaration, I can not vote for this measure"—gold bonds.

But, Mr. President, all that has been changed and the bondholder, not the taxpayer, is now to reap all the profits of a gold bond over a coin bond. The people "are not in it," as the phrase goes; only the bondholding class. And that class is largely the stockholders of national banks and come in for another nice plum in other sections of this financial scheme for the relief of the classes at the expense of the masses.

The greenbacks, which stood the shock of war and held their own when all else felt the depressing influence of the crime of '73, and which have weathered every storm that has blown across the financial world, are to be impounded in order that the national banks may have no rival in the expansion of their notes and may still further increase the issue of their notes and the profit thereon. To the profit on a gold over a coin bond, said to be 25 per cent, since a 3 per cent gold bond would sell for more than a 4 per cent coin bond, there is added by this scheme the profit of increased circulation, and both profits go to the stockholders of the national banks.

What part the money power in this country has taken in the preparation and passage of this financial scheme is known only to those who enjoy its confidence and share in the contributions of its wealth. But there is one feature in this financial scheme, an earmark of the money power, which can not be mistaken.

The power given to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds at his pleasure effectually sidetracks the Congress, mortgages every interest of the people at the discretion of a single officer, who, from his official duties, is far more connected with and interested in the money power than in the popular prosperity. That power never came from the people and is not likely to be used for their benefit. For the "endless chain" of greenbacks this bill substitutes an "endless chain" of bonds running uninterruptedly from the Treasury to the banks and back to the Treasury.

On the 6th day of December, 1899, there were in the Treasury $238,065,588.87 of gold; there were in circulation Treasury obligations amounting to $483,870,133 for which gold could be demanded and must be paid under this bill. Such a presentation and demand would leave $245,804,544.13 of notes to be redeemed after all the gold had been paid out and require a sale of $200,000,000 of gold bonds to raise the amount required by the provisions of this financial scheme.

Thus it is placed in the power of the banks to create an "endless chain" of bonds payable in gold and bearing interest in gold, and all proceeds going into the bank vaults and leaving no returning tracks therefrom, lessening the amount of circulation.

The power of the national banks, already far too great, is increased by this bill, which turns over to them the right to issue all the paper money of the country. That creates a great bank trust and gives it a monopoly of the paper currency and increases the profits of the banks.

The voice of the people calls upon this Congress to suppress all trusts, combines, and syndicates of every character whose operations hinder the great law of competition in anything in which the people are interested, and both parties say it must be done; and now this financial scheme, shutting the issue department of the Treasury, shuts also that of the State bank and opens wide, without competition of the Government or State banks, the issue department of the national banks, and compels every man to make obeisance thereto. The power to establish small banks of $25,000 capital in country towns was provided by the original House bill, but has been totally abandoned in the Senate substitute, leaving the large banks in commercial centers to monopolize and control without competition.

As for myself I am in favor of State banks. I believe in local self-government. National banks are not consistent with local self-government. They can bring about a panic at will by touching a button in the East, whose effect will be felt in the western or central portion of the country; can advance or lower the price of stocks and bonds at will, and destroy the price of property, and then bring flush times by agreement, and thus precipitate a panic at any time. That is one of the great objections to this bill. I believe in State banks, and I believe in repealing the 10 per cent tax upon their issues.

Let them issue the money and have it at home. This bill is not local self-government, but it is centralization in operation and effect. With the State-bank system, based upon proper securities and under proper regulations, if a panic should occur it would be limited and less disastrous.

This financial scheme in either House bill or Senate substitute contains no help, no relief, no aid, and no assistance to any class of people but the rich and influential. It is another illustration of "taking away from him that hath not and giving to him that hath," making the rich richer and the poor poorer.

The motives which underlie a financial scheme so utterly destitute of public sanction and approval must be sought elsewhere than in that "general welfare" for which this Union was created and its Constitution ordained and established. There exists in the public mind an apprehension that the last Presidential election was won not in the forum of argument and debate, but was wrested from the consciences and convictions of the people through their fears and apprehensions, and not by fair and legitimate means.

The candidates and supporters of the Democratic party were held up before the people as a gang of socialists, red republicans, anarchists, and nihilists because their platform boldly declared against "government by injunction" and refused to accept a ruling of the Supreme Court as final and conclusive against an income tax which previous decisions of the court had sustained.

The Democratic party demonstrated to the people that with the mints of the United States open to the free coinage of silver as well as gold, the parity of the two metals would be self-acting and self-adjusting and no longer dependent on the provisions of a repealable law. We advocated an abundant supply of good money, not "cheap" money, but a supply of metal money equal to the needs of the whole country, rather than the "dear" money which a gold standard compels.

We, the Democrats, contended that property and the movements of trade should regulate the quantity of money rather than that the business of 75,000,000 industrious people should be handicapped and cramped by a supply of money controlled in the interest of the manipulators of banks, trusts, and corporations. We, the Democrats, have stood and stand square to every wind that blows for both the silver and the gold coins of the Federal Constitution, and denied the authority of the Federal Congress to divorce the two metals. We held that the right of legal tender of either silver or gold coins was so secured by the Federal Constitution that it was without the power of Congress to make either coins the sole legal tender in business or trade.

We, the Democrats, demanded that bonds payable in coin and bought with that knowledge on the part of the buyer should remain redeemable in coin, at the option of the Treasury, when presented for redemption. We, the Democrats, opposed the issue of interest-bearing bonds in times of peace, and that carried the moral obligation that Congress should neither create nor recognize the necessity for issuing bonds in times of peace, whether they were to be payable in coin or gold.

We accepted, as graciously as we could, the ruling of the Supreme Court that under the constitutional power to "coin money" Congress could authorize the Treasury to issue notes as currency, and that it was a plain principle of political economy that a non-interest-bearing currency provided by the United States was preferable to the notes of national banks based on an interest-bearing bond.

We, the Democrats, deprecated that "financial servitude to London," which this financial scheme inaugurates; and we believed firmly that the United States, now recognized as the most powerful nation on earth and as the wealthiest and most progressive people, could have and maintain its own financial policy of gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and that there was no power, either material or political or commercial, that could make us afraid to pursue our own policy on our own convictions as to what was best for our own interest; we felt that this great country, with all its wealth and power, was able to stand alone and face the frown of any power, interest, or potentate.

In that glorious pride of country we failed not before the reason and judgment of our fellow-citizens, but we succumb to what we believe to be the most stupendous fraud of the ballot and the most unprecedented apprehensions that our patriotism and our pride of country would not keep from wreck and ruin this mighty governmental fabric, freighted as it is with the hopes and fortunes of our too patient people.

This bill is the result of that defeat at the polls, and its patrons both in and out of this Capitol hope that its gold standard, its fostering care of national banks, its making an endless chain of bonds, its corralling of the greenbacks, and its manifest declarations that the Republican party is prone to give its aid to those who can return, in kind, the benefactions which this financial scheme distributes with a most liberal hand to corporate wealth will find its recompense and reward in the to-day of 1900. I say to our friends the enemy on the other side of this Chamber, "Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth."

When the near-by canvass of 1900 lays bare the ugly questions which are shaping up to it; when the open policies and the half-concealed policies and the no-policy course of the present Administration, having control of all branches of the Government, is held up before the calcium light of public criticism; when its new departure from doctrine long adhered to and sanctified by being in platform after platform, as is shown by this bill; when employees who win bread by labor feel the weight of accumulated taxes; when the small commercial enterprises that have been crushed by combines under this Administration raise their ghostly forms as witnesses; when trusts, unprosecuted by this Administration, have become rampant and defiantly rear their imperialistic crests, overawing trade; when the countless columns of countless millions of dollars expended by this Administration are made to confront the taxpayers in this 1900, it will be in order for the authors and promoters of this silver-killing bill to exclaim, "Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the time is rapidly approaching when this measure is to be voted on, and whatever may be said in its support or in opposition to it must be said speedily. I have not had time to make as close an analysis of the measure as I had hoped to make, and therefore will not consume much time in discussing it. It is so radically different from my ideas of what a great monetary bill should be that it is very difficult to find in it anything that commends itself to my judgment.

The money question—and I use the expression in its most enlarged sense—is an important question, I believe the most important before the American people to-day, and it will continue so until it is finally settled upon a sound, honest, and scientific basis.

I am an adherent of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1. If there be those who have heretofore advocated the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 who have receded from it, I do not know them and I am not of them. If the doctrine was good in 1893, it has been good every hour and every day from that time to the present and it will continue to be good throughout the ages; and no mere change in commercial or industrial conditions—ephemeral, false, and deceptive as they are—can change the conviction of the American people on the subject of the relation of gold and silver. No such fleeting change will ever close the eyes of the American people to the fact that there has been a studied, constant, and sustained effort on the part of those charged with administering the affairs of the Government to discredit silver and to injure the industries and the industrial classes of our country, thereby to promote the interests of gold and the interests of the advocates of the gold standard.

It is not pleasant to think that any man or any class of men charged with the legislation or with the administration of the Government would be so far forgetful of their duty to the public, even to the humblest citizen of the land, as to be actuated by low and base motives; and yet I have never been able to bring myself to the belief that there was a lofty thought or motive or a pure purpose in the advocacy of bills such as the one now before the Senate. The measure is wholly selfish, sordid, greedy, sinister, and untrue to the interests of the people, and, if put in operation, will bring to this country more distress, want, and suffering than all the wars and pestilences and famines through which we have passed in our national history.

Mr. President, permit me to say that I am not an advocate of silver because I believe silver to be better money than gold. I believe it to be equally as good, but I advocate the use of both gold and silver. I am not the advocate of either gold or silver, because I believe either of them to be better than paper money, for I believe a well-regulated and limited volume of full legal-tender paper money to be as good as either or both.

I utterly repudiate the idea that there is any such thing as commercial value in money as money, but I will not discuss that question. That has passed into a conviction with me long ago. It is not open to debate any longer in my mind. I believe it is as well established as is any other established fact, yet I realize that a great many men hold to the barbarous doctrine—the monstrous doctrine, I may say; the illogical doctrine—that we can not properly use anything as money unless the material upon which it is stamped has a distinct commercial value equivalent to the value of money itself.

I have heard repeated here, over and over again, that it is impossible to create value by legislation. I heard the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] proclaim it in this Chamber some years ago.

Mr. ALDRICH. Never.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator now enters a denial.

Mr. ALDRICH. I never proclaimed any such doctrine.

Mr. ALLEN. I am rejoiced to know that he is improving.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; I am not improving.

Mr. ALLEN. And that he now occupies a different position from that occupied then.

Mr. ALDRICH. I never occupied such a position.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator now admit that legislation can affect values?

Mr. ALDRICH. He does.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to get it on record. Let it be spoken loud enough, that the RECORD may contain it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I never held any other position, and I never expressed any other opinion, here or elsewhere.

Mr. ALLEN. In 1893, when we were discussing the bill to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman silver law, in which the honorable Senator from Rhode Island participated extensively, it was argued upon that side of the Chamber and by some upon this side that there was no power in legislation to affect or create values.

Mr. SPOONER. That is another thing—to "create values."

Mr. ALLEN. No; it is not another thing. If you can affect values by legislation, you can create and destroy, because that is what it means.

Mr. SPOONER. Well——

Mr. ALLEN. But, Mr. President, put that aside. I am glad to know there is progress even on that side of the Chamber, although it comes slowly.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. The power to destroy does not involve the power to create.

Mr. ALLEN. It may not——

Mr. SPOONER. A potato bug can destroy a potato, but it can not create one. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I do not care to have the course of my remarks interrupted by matters that are calculated to create diversion.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg pardon.

Mr. ALLEN. This is a serious question with me; it is not a laughable matter to those concerned. I do not like to be made the butt of jests of that kind. They have no place here.

It was argued upon that side of the Chamber, and it was believed, if not argued, by some upon this side, that there was no power in law to create or affect values. I now understand the leader of the Republican party, the Senator from Rhode Island, to admit that they were wrong in 1893 and that my position is right now.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I never occupied any such position in 1893, and I do not know of anybody upon this side of the Chamber who did occupy such a position.

Mr. ALLEN. I have been looking up the discussion of 1893, and I find by examining the RECORD that the Senator from Rhode Island was present, giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the people on that occasion. He was one of the gentlemen who voted to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act of 1890; and by his vote, by his associations, by his influence, and by what he said, he gave currency to the thought that it was not within the power of Congress to create or affect values by legislation. Now he admits that it is. The progress is somewhat slow and possibly painful, but nevertheless marked.

I was about to say, before engaging in this side discussion, that that question seems to have been settled by those who formed the Constitution and adopted it; for Congress is by that instrument given power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof." Certainly it must have been in the minds of those who framed the Constitution, and in the minds of the people who adopted it, that it was within the power of Congress to regulate the value of money.

What does "regulate value" mean? Can not regulation be carried to the extent of creating and destroying? "To regulate" certainly means to affect, to change, to move from one standard to another. If the value of money were a thing fixed by trade, then it was a work of supererogation in the fathers of the Constitution to invest that power in Congress. The power to control the volume of money, to issue money, and to regulate its value is a sovereign power which no Government has a right to alienate or to abandon. You might as well say, if you have a right to turn this power over to the national banks or to private institutions, that the power to tax the people, which is also a sovereign power, may be farmed out to private individuals and exercised by the few to the detriment of the many, as it was in Rome at one time in her history.

The power to raise armies and navies, which is part of the power to make war, and essential to national preservation, is a sovereign power; yet Congress has as much right to turn over to private individuals and private corporations the power to make war, to conclude peace, to raise armies, and to construct navies as it has to turn over the power to coin money and regulate its value.

Whenever we concede that Congress has the right to abandon one of these powers to be exercised by private institutions or individuals, we admit that Congress has the right to abandon all sovereign power and to turn over the Government in its entirety to private interests and to the few, and therefore, because this bill is an abandonment of the sovereign power to make money and to regulate its value, I am opposed to it.

In 1893, when we were discussing the money question here, another argument was made by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island; and I refer to him because he is the general tipstaff and major-domo of his party. That argument was that silver should not be coined on terms of equality with gold because the silver barons would make money out of it, and all over the country that argument was used by the advocates of the gold standard. They said it would not do to coin silver on terms of equality with gold, because if we did the silver miners, the silver barons—they became barons after a time—would make money out of it. And we all recall the drivel that was sifted out from the hustings about the 50-cent dollar, as though such a thing as a 50-cent dollar were possible.

How stands the argument in respect to this bill? Who is protesting upon that side against turning over to the national banks the right to make, by the issuance of their currency and by the retirement of the different forms of paper money and silver, more money than the "silver barons" in their wildest dreams ever expected to make? It was wrong in the owners of silver mines in 1893 to make money out of the people. So said our friends upon that side of the Chamber. It was wrong to put them where they were before the crime of 1873; and it was a crime against civilization and against the rights of the men, women, and children of this country, let it be sneered at publicly or privately as it may. If it was wrong to coin silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 at that time because it would result in a benefit to a certain class of our citizens much greater in number than the beneficiaries of this bill, is it not for a like reason wrong in 1900 to pass this measure because its only beneficiaries will be about 3,500 banks? I am not the enemy of legitimate banks. I realize as fully as any man the necessity of banks of discount and deposit. In our complex civilization they can not be dispensed with; they are necessary.

But when they perform those offices they perform every function that properly pertains to legitimate banking, and when they are permitted to issue their notes as money they are invading the sovereign power of the people of this nation. There is where I draw the line, and there is where I believe the people will draw it forever.

Mr. President, this is a bill for confiscation. Our Constitution provides that "no State shall * * * pass any * * * law impairing the obligation of contracts." So the framers of the Constitution said. And yet this bill by its express terms impairs the obligations of all contracts, public and private. Now, is there any doubt about that? It may be said that while the Constitution prohibits a State from passing laws impairing the obligations of contracts that it does not prohibit the nation; and I admit that technically that statement is true.

Mr. SPOONER. There is a moral prohibition, anyway.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Wisconsin very truthfully says there is a moral inhibition against it. Technically Congress can pass a law impairing the obligations of a contract and destroy the contract, because to impair its obligations means to destroy it in part or in whole. Is it wise for the Congress to do that which the Constitution has prohibited the States from doing in this respect? If there is an obligation on the part of the legislatures of the several States of the Union to preserve the binding force of contracts and their obligations, does not that obligation extend to the nation as a political entity? Yet, by the express terms of this bill the obligations of contracts are to be impaired and violated. I will read section 2 of the House bill:

> That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act; and all other obligations—> public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section.

There it is, an unblushing provision, impairing the obligation of contracts. Mr. President, under the terms of that section it would make no difference that a citizen had entered into a contract payable in so many silver dollars or so much lawful money of the United States. He will find when this bill shall become a law that every one of his obligations is transformed from an obligation payable at the time the contract was made in the lawful money of the country into an obligation to pay in gold according to the standard fixed by this measure.

Mr. STEWART. Does that include all taxes?

Mr. ALLEN. Everything.

Mr. STEWART. All taxes?

Mr. ALLEN. All taxes.

Mr. STEWART. Then what becomes of silver, if it will not pay taxes?

Mr. ALLEN. It is gone. That is the purpose of the bill. I supposed the Senator from Nevada understood that.

Mr. STEWART. I do understand it, but I want to chip in here to make it a little more emphatic. The Senator from Nebraska understands it; I want the public to understand it. It is very important to be understood that the silver dollar will not pay taxes any more.

Mr. ALLEN. It goes out of the category of money.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is speaking of the House bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Of both bills, only one is a little more artfully drawn than the other. Whoever drew the House bill had the courage of his convictions and was willing to take the responsibility for it, but the man who drew the Senate amendment had great craft and no moral courage.

Mr. President, it embraces not only taxes but every obligation that a private citizen, or the United States, or a State government, or a municipality, can enter into. All of the vast body of indebtedness, national, State, municipal, county, and private, is converted into a gold indebtedness, regardless of the terms of the contract creating that indebtedness. We have no assurance that this measure will not become a law. It has passed one body. It is here; and while the Senate committee have stricken it out, they have left the substance of it beneath the hidden folds of the skillfully drawn amendments that are presented here.

Mr. President. I never expected to see the time come in the history of my country when it would be guilty of spoliation—an act against the people which it prohibited the States from doing. I doubt if there can be found in modern legislation so bold a declaration as that contained in this section, that all private and public contracts shall be payable in the standard created by the bill rather than in the money of the contract, and if there be a disparity between gold and silver and paper money and the debtor is compelled to pay in the dearer money, costing more sacrifice, more of his property, more of his labor to obtain a dollar than formerly, what is that but confiscation? So this ought to be termed "a bill to confiscate the property of the people" rather than be named as it is.

There is another thing about this bill which is vicious and inexcusable. It is a bill to perpetuate the national debt.

Mr. TELLER. It increases it, too.

Mr. ALLEN. To increase and to perpetuate it. To my utter surprise I heard a distinguished New England Senator say five years ago that it was never the intention of the railroads to pay the principal of their debt. I was so much surprised that I rose at my desk and asked him if he spoke seriously, and he said he did. I want to put a question to the Senator from Rhode Island, who has this measure in charge, and to whose door much of the wrong it will inflict upon the people will be brought. Do you expect to see this nation pay off its indebtedness?

Mr. ALDRICH. I certainly do.

Mr. ALLEN. When and how?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a question which I suppose every Senator will have to answer for himself.

Mr. ALLEN. Will it come in the lifetime of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope so.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator expect it?

Mr. STEWART. The mode of paying it off under this bill is to provide for its perpetual increase.

Mr. ALDRICH. The expectations of a man's life are something as to which no man can answer with respect to time.

Mr. ALLEN. I am afraid the method of paying the debt will be very much like the case of a man I once knew who came to my office and said, "I am getting out of debt pretty rapidly. I paid $2,500 to-day. I will soon be out of debt." I said, "How did you do it?" He said, "I gave a new note." That is the purpose of this bill—to renew our debt. By a system of renewals, pleasantly called refunding, the national debt has been perpetuated for nearly forty years, and according to the terms of this bill we are to issue bonds that will not mature for thirty years. Then when the time comes and they mature, and the Senator from Rhode Island and I shall have passed away and others are on the scene of action, they will find this Government in such condition that it will be impossible to pay the national debt, and it will be renewed, and the principal and interest will bear upon future generations as a heavy burden for endless time. That is the purpose of the bill.

I have no hesitancy in declaring as my solemn conviction that it is the purpose of this bill to perpetuate the national debt; and its authors have no idea that the time will ever come when that debt will be discharged. So the 75,000,000 of our people and the millions that are to come are to be saddled with an interest-bearing, perpetual national debt to eat up their substance in order that the idle few, the gold gamblers and the money sharks, may live, at the expense of the toiling masses, in idleness; and this because the Republican party is the debtor of this class of people for political and financial favors past and present, and to be rendered in the future.

Have we come to the time in the history of this great nation when we can not rise above our sordid surroundings and say we will put national banks aside, giving them their proper consideration, and everything else aside, and legislate upon money matters and upon other subjects in the interest of all and in justice to all? It would seem that we have come to the parting of the ways, and to follow the direction marked out by this measure will lead to where the few are to have all the benefits of legislation and the many must bear its burdens.

It is not an uncommon thing to hear men say that a national debt is a national blessing; and every once in a while you will pick up a paper or a magazine containing an article which attempts to demonstrate that a national debt is a national blessing, and that when the people are kept busy earning money to pay their taxes and the interest upon their debts, they are prevented from getting together and agitating public questions and grumbling. I understand in some sections of the country it is held to be a crime to be an agitator. They look upon a man who is called an agitator as a man who is fit to be expelled from society and deprived of his citizenship.

I thank God I am an agitator. I delight in being called an agitator. Agitation is life, motion, energy, and success. If you point me to a man who is called conservative, I will point you to a man whose powers, mental, moral, or physical, are on the road to senility and decay. A man who does nothing and never thinks except when provoked by abnormal circumstances, who is satisfied with himself; a man who does nothing and thinks nothing, or who thought and acted to thirty or forty years ago and quit thinking or acting and has not engaged in the occupation since then, is of no value in this world and will not be in the next. He is in the attitude of the minister's son when caught swearing. A man said to him, "I thought you were a preacher's son; that your father is a Christian." The boy replied, "He is, but he has not been working at his trade for a good many years."

A great many such men who claim to be conservatives have not had an intelligent thought pass through their minds in a third of a century. They are mere inert matter, a drag, a dead weight. They desire to be considered conservative. It is more polite to be a conservative than an agitator, you know. Every evolution in mental and physical science, every discovery in the various departments of progress that has been made, has been through agitation and investigation. Agitation is investigation, and investigation is agitation. But the conservative gentlemen, who know nothing and think nothing and care for nothing except themselves and their particular friends, would have it understood that every man who does not believe as they do has simply water running in his veins, while their veins are surcharged with the finest and the purest aristocratic blood. So, Mr. President, I am an agitator when I assail the provisions of this bill.

Here is the monstrous purpose of saddling upon the present and future generations of our country a debt they will never be able to pay, and there is no expectation of their ever being able to pay it; and yet a majority of the Senators, representing every State in this Union, will sit here silent and permit this crime to be consummated without a protest, simply because the people will bear it and its burdens rather than rise against it.

This bill not only creates a perpetual national debt, but it turns over the power of taxation to the Secretary of the Treasury. By it we abdicate that power, for when we say that the Secretary of the Treasury may issue Government bonds ad libitum, as he sees fit, as this bill provides, then the question of taxation to meet the interest upon those bonds is merely perfunctory, because the foundation for the taxation has been laid by the mere caprice of an executive officer, and the taxation can not be escaped.

Mr. President, who has asked for the passage of this bill?

Mr. STEWART. That question never will be answered.

Mr. ALLEN. It will never be truthfully answered in this world. It may be in the next, where it is said things are finally set right; and probably, after all, it is well that the Bible doctrine of the future rewards and punishments is not entirely destroyed, and that the law of responsibility is to be eventually enforced against us.

Who has asked for a change of the law? I defy a Senator in this Chamber to point to one petition asking for this change which has come before this body from what may be termed the people, as distinguished from the plutocrats—the common, plain people, as distinguished from the aristocracy of wealth that smells to heaven. Not a farmer or a farmers' organization; no organization has asked for its change except those organizations that are influenced by the bank trust that sought to foist this measure upon the country some years ago. The people are silent about it because they know but little about it. They will experience its effects within the next year or two, when its provisions get into active operation among them.

Mr. President, where was this bill framed? That is important to know. It was framed in 1897, at the Indianapolis monetary conference; not exactly in the language we find it here, but in substance. It was framed by a conference of national bankers and those interested directly in national-bank management. It was a self-constituted organization of financiers, like the Podsnaps and Veneerings, who thought all financiering consisted in cent per cent. They met together in Indianapolis, I think possibly two years ago last January. They were not an official organization. They came here and began swarming all over this city, barnstorming the White House and the halls of Congress to have this measure put before Congress and enacted into a law at that time; but the Republican party was a little too cunning to be caught at that time with this measure. They looked it over. "Suppose," they said, "we put it into operation now, and it proves a boomerang before the Presidential election of 1900; it will do us more injury than good, and probably destroy us." So the tariff question was put forward and discussed in 1897, and this measure was held back until the closing days of the present Administration, that it might get into operation and the evil consequences of its enactment could not be known until after the next Presidential election.

I have not a doubt that for the first few months after this bill shall go into operation the thoughtless of the country will be induced to believe it is a measure of great value. The currency will be inflated like a balloon filled with gas to the point of bursting; there will be apparent prosperity throughout the land; but when the time comes, as come it will, after the Presidential election is over and the enemies of the Government are enthroned in power for four years more, then will come the slow and deadly process of contraction; then will come ashes and ruin, bankruptcy and decay, to the nation and to our homes, and the great body of our toiling, struggling, wealth-producing citizens, before the campaign, four years hence, will have been bound hand and foot by a chain of indebtedness created by this infamous measure, from which they can never escape. And nobody but this so-called Indianapolis convention, the outward exponents of the bank trust, has ever asked for the passage of this bill.

Mr. President, I should like to have some Senator who knows all about this question—and there are many of them on the other side of the Chamber who think they do—tell me wherein bank currency is superior to full legal-tender paper money issued by the Government. If it is superior, I should like to know it. I see the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, and of course, being at the head of the Finance Committee and having studied the matter thoroughly, he knows, and I should like to hear from him if he believes, and if so, why he believes, that bank currency is superior to greenbacks or to legal-tender notes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I presume the Senator does not ask me that question with the expectation of an answer at this time. I will say to him, to relieve what seems to be a misapprehension in his mind, that this proposed law does not change the status of either. It does not give to bank currency any additional rights or privileges over what it has at this moment. The Senator seems to feel as though we were doing something for the banks.

Mr. ALLEN. It is a harmless sort of bill, is it?

Mr. ALDRICH. I should not describe it as harmless, but as beneficial.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator seems to think this inquiry is not germane to the discussion, and that there is nothing in the bill to prevent the use of greenbacks or Treasury notes and different forms of Government paper money. Why, Mr. President, the very purpose of this bill is to impound and destroy every greenback and every Treasury note and every form of Government paper money. That has been the cry which has come up from the bulls and bears of Wall street for the last three years, and has been even occasionally echoed from Princeton, if there is any life left there. The greenback is sought to be impounded and destroyed, and if you do not destroy it utterly and literally, why we are to build a wall around it by legislation, put it in a prison from which it can not escape, and let it die as the prisoner in his rayless dungeon dies to earthly things before the breath leaves his body.

The very purpose of this bill is to retire the silver dollar, the greenbacks, and the Treasury notes, amounting in round numbers to about a thousand million dollars, and to turn over the field now occupied by them to national-bank currency for that amount or more, and that currency is to occupy the channels which have heretofore been filled by these different forms of Government money. Why should that be done? The greenback has cost us nothing. There are men who are to-day gray who have done business upon nothing during their natural lives but upon greenbacks. They have known no other money.

Mr. President, the greenback was the money that carried us successfully through the struggle from 1861 to 1865. It was the money that preserved the life of this nation and permitted you to occupy that chair and me to occupy this desk. It is the sacred money of the common people, and now by this bill, without excuse, it is proposed to destroy it. And destroy it for what reason? Destroy it that private corporations may have the power of issuing certificates of indebtedness of their own and forcing them into circulation among an unwilling people, and forcing the people to pay large sums of interest upon those certificates of indebtedness issued in the form of national-bank currency.

Mr. BUTLER. Money that will support a nation in time of war certainly is the soundest money that a government ever had, is it not? Does the Senator think that any country could not support itself in time of peace on money that would save the country in time of war?

Mr. STEWART. Did gold ever do that?

Mr. BUTLER. No.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Nevada is right, as he is always right on the financial question.

Mr. President, there is no history of a war in the last one hundred and fifty years where both gold and silver have not at the first opportunity gone out of sight during hostilities, and that was the case in this country. This Government forced its soldiers to take $16 a month during the civil war in greenbacks for their services, money worth at that time about 33 cents on the dollar in comparison with gold. The greenback was in universal circulation among all classes of people, and now, forty years after its issuance, when there is no popular demand for its destruction, when the people upon the other hand are clamorous that it shall be retained, the Republican party proposes to humble itself at the feet of this money power and give it the right to usurp the field so long occupied by the greenback.

There is not ingenuity enough upon the other side of the Chamber to invent a theory or a respectable subterfuge that will deceive the commonest American mind upon this subject.

Is there not anything in this measure that appeals to the sense of honor and to the patriotism of legislators? Are the vast millions of men, women, and children to be bound like slaves and, under the provisions of this bill, turned over to be robbed by the financial concerns of the country? Will not some effort be made to prevent that great calamity?

Mr. President, the Republican party professes to be and to have been the friend of silver. In 1888 the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the White House drafted the silver plank of the Republican platform, denouncing the Democratic party for an attempt to demonetize silver. In 1892 the Republican party declared in favor of both gold and silver as standard money. In 1896 it declared in favor of international bimetallism and in favor of the gold standard until that could be brought about.

What has it done to bring it about? Nothing, absolutely nothing. It may be said that under a law passed shortly before the close of the Fifty-fourth Congress a commission was appointed and sent abroad to negotiate international bimetallism, and so it was; but, Mr. President, when that commission went abroad, when they were in London, Berlin, and Paris, the Indianapolis conference was in session, doing its deadly work, and two hours before the close of the extra session of the Fifty-fifth Congress the President sent us a message advising us to pass a bill along the lines pointed out at the Indianapolis conference before the adjournment of that session.

Before I read from that message I want to emphasize the fact that when Congress had agreed to adjourn, had fixed upon the date of final adjournment, and after that and within two hours or less of the moment of final adjournment, the President sent this message. What did he say to us? Let me read it:

To the Congress of the United States:

* * * * * * *

Another question of very great importance is that of the establishment of our currency and banking system on a better basis, which I commented upon in my inaugural address in the following words:

"Our financial system needs some revision; our money is all good now, but its value must not further be threatened. It should all be put upon an enduring basis, not subject to easy attack, nor its stability to doubt or dispute. The several forms of our paper money offer, in my judgment, a constant embarrassment to the Government and imperil a safe balance in the Treasury."

Nothing was settled more clearly at the late national election than the determination upon the part of the people to keep their currency stable in value and equal to that of the most advanced nations of the world.

The soundness of our currency is nowhere questioned. No loss can occur to its holders. It is the system which should be simplified and strenghtened, keeping our money just as good as it is now, with less expense to the Government and the people.

A notable assembly of business men, with delegates from 29 States and Territories, was held at Indianapolis in January of this year. The financial situation commanded their earnest attention, and after a two days' session the convention recommended to Congress the appointment of a monetary commission.

I commend this report to the consideration of Congress.

This subject should receive the attention of Congress at its special session. It ought not to be postponed until the regular session.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 24, 1897.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the date of that message, and who signed it.

Mr. ALLEN. It is signed William McKinley, Executive Mansion, July 24, 1897. I think it reached here, as I recollect it, about two hours before we adjourned.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether he understands that as recommending any system of currency legislation adopted by the Indianapolis convention, or only as adopting the recommendation for the appointment of commissioners to investigate and report?

Mr. ALLEN. I would hardly say that the President of the United States would recommend the work of the Indianapolis conference unless he thought that work ought to be enacted into law. I hold in my hand the proceedings of that conference. I will not stop to read it, for it is long.

Mr. ALLISON. They did not recommend any plan, I believe.

Mr. ALLEN. They recommended the adoption of the gold standard. There is no question about where those gentlemen were and how they stood. They were in favor of the single gold standard and in favor of the retirement of greenbacks.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand from the President's message, which the Senator read, that the Indianapolis convention recommended the appointment of a governmental commission to take into account all these questions; that that was what the President recommended and not any plan that was unfolded at Indianapolis.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, Mr. President, that would not be my understanding of the recommendation. I presume it is open to either of two constructions. But you will remember, as I do, that that commission visited this city and had copies of their bill in print and circulated it among members of the House and Senators.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not at that time.

Mr. ALLEN. Before that time; I beg your pardon. I was a recipient of a call from them myself before that time. There will be no mistake as to what their purpose was or what the purpose of this conference was.

Mr. President, it was understood then that this Indianapolis conference was a meeting of the agents and friends of the national banks who sought to destroy silver, the greenbacks, and the legal-tender notes, and I have yet to hear a man offer a reason for the destruction of either. They have served every purpose of money, Mr. President, they are money, as they circulate as a universal medium of exchange and are everywhere received for services and property and have the legal-tender quality, and such a medium of exchange is money, regardless of the material upon which it is impressed or stamped.

Not one word has been said against the greenbacks in this Chamber, and this old friend the people have been familiar with for forty years is to be stricken down in the dark, not at their behest, not because the people called for it, not because they do not protest against it, but because the allies and the friends of the Republican party demand its destruction as a consideration for their support; and everyone of them will be found supporting the Republican ticket this year, as they have in the past. Mr. President, they will shed their gold in this contest as a patriot would shed his blood in a war for humanity and in defense of his country.

The general subject of money I do not propose to discuss. As I said, that has passed into a conviction with me and is no longer open to discussion.

In 1890 the Republican party began to get a little uncertain in the halls of Congress on the subject of silver. It wanted to run with the hare and hold with the hounds, and it undertook to do so, but failed. It professed undying loyalty to the cause of bimetallism in its conventions and by the utterances of public men, while secretly in legislation it plotted against silver. So it injected into the act of 1890 a stump speech in this language:

It being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law.

That was an anomaly in legislation, and language of that kind is absolutely foreign to correct and honest legislation. It stands without a precedent in the history of our country to that time.

But, Mr. President, it was a falsehood upon its face, and it ought not to have deceived any intelligent man. How are we to maintain a law of equality between two things when we strike down their equality? Parity is a law of equality, and the parity between gold and silver referred to in that act was the debt-paying and purchasing power of these two metals when coined at a fixed ratio.

Since 1873, on all occasions and at every opportunity, the Republican party has stealthily stricken down silver, and that party alone is responsible for the condition of silver to-day. In 1893, when the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act was repealed, a majority of Republican Senators voted for the bill. They had it in their power by voting the other way to have defeated that bill and save that clause, and it will not do now to crawl out of sight like a cuttlefish and say that Cleveland and his mere handful of rag, tag, and bobtail are responsible for it.

But, Mr. President, the Republican party in 1893 did more than to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act. They voted for the Democratic platform; and, with the exception of a few words omitted, this language occurs in the Democratic platform of that year:

And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in payment of debts.

I have called attention to the fact that a commission was sent abroad shortly after the inauguration of the present Chief Executive to negotiate international bimetallism. There were, unfortunately, those who believed that this declaration, which finds its precedent in the act of 1890, was intended to be carried out. They supposed that it was made in good faith, and that as soon as the Republican party was in power some steps would be taken to bring about international bimetallism.

Now, Mr. President, turn back if you will to the time when that commission, composed of the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], ex-Vice-President Stevenson, and General Payne, was abroad. What was transpiring in this country at the time?

At the precise time when they were abroad undertaking to negotiate an international agreement for international bimetallism this Indianapolis conference was in session, receiving the aid and comfort of the President of the United States; and at that time the present Secretary of the Treasury, for whose conduct the President is to be responsible as long as he occupies the position, was before the other House with a bill drafted in his Department trying to commit the country to the single gold standard, according to his own evidence and as he expressly declares in his testimony, to a national debt payable in gold, that should never mature except at the option of the Government, and to a debt where the creditor should have nothing to say respecting the period of its maturity. In his evidence before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures in the other branch of Congress he declared that it was his purpose to fix the gold standard more firmly upon the country; and he was doing that while our commissioners were abroad endeavoring to negotiate international bimetallism.

The President was giving aid and encouragement to the proceedings of the Indianapolis conference of monetary reformers (?), and the Secretary of the Treasury was before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures of the House of Representatives, with a bill drafted by his able solicitor, of the same purport and drift of the measure before Congress at this moment, undertaking to commit the country and his party to the gold standard.

Why, sir, the commissioners were undermined at every step. Everywhere they went in Europe—as was said by the chairman of the commission, on their return, in a speech on the 17th of January, 1898—they were met with the declaration by those with whom they sought to negotiate that the press of this country was declaring that the policy of the Republican party was the policy of the gold standard; that the President was giving encouragement—the Senator did not say that, but that was the fact—to the adoption of the gold standard, and that the Secretary of the Treasury—he did say that—had appeared before a committee of another branch of Congress and advocated that the Government and the Republican party should be committed to the single gold standard.

Was there good faith in all this? Do you hope to make the American people believe that this was good faith and that the Republican party has sought in good faith to bring about international bimetallism? It was a sham and a pretense. There was no purpose, no hope, no expectation when that commission went abroad that anything would come of it in the nature of an agreement for international bimetallism. It was only to comply in a perfunctory way with the declaration of the Republican platform of 1896.

But, Mr. President, the Republican party was not to stop when it failed to secure international bimetallism. According to the declaration in the act of 1893 I have quoted, it was to go on and secure bimetallism by legislation if it could not by an international agreement. What has been done even in the way of introducing a bill to bring about the free coinage of silver in accordance with the declaration of the act of 1893?

The Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Iowa voted for that bill. If you will turn to the RECORD you will find that they committed themselves to its provisions. They were bound, too, by the platforms of their party. What have you gentlemen on the other side done, or what has your party done, to bring about bimetallism by legislation? I speak of the Senators from Rhode Island and Iowa because they are in many respects their party. You had not done a thing until yesterday, when the Senator from Rhode Island, in the closing hours of this interesting discussion, introduced a proposed amendment to the bill now before the Senate. I will read it:

> Amendment reported by Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Finance, to the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes, viz: Add the following as an additional section:
> SEC. —. That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism, provided the same be secured by concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world, and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver.

It is not intended to obstruct, so the Senator wants the country to believe, the accomplishment of international bimetallism, when there is not a thought or expectation of taking one step to bring about international bimetallism and there never has been since the return of the monetary commission in 1898 or even before that time.

Mr. President, do you suppose, does any sane man suppose, that the people of the United States are to be deceived by this declaration? Whenever a court of last resort wants to overrule a decision and wants to appear to be consistent with itself it always says in its opinion, "This opinion is not in conflict with the opinion in the case of Smith vs. Jones in such and such a report," naming it.

The Senator from Rhode Island, speaking for his party, knowing the inconsistency between the professions of that party for bimetallism and the provisions of this bill, wants an official declaration made by the Senate that they do not intend to obstruct the obtaining of international bimetallism. It is not a question of obstruction. It is a question of what you will do. Why does not the Senator in the use of his constructive genius invent some method of bringing about international bimetallism? Why is not some bill or resolution introduced in this body or in the other branch of Congress to bring about international bimetallism? Why does not the Republican party do something except to sit silent upon this subject?

Mr. BUTLER. I suppose they mean they will not obstruct the effort of England to force it upon us.

Mr. ALLEN. No; it is a mere cheap method of trying to get votes, and very cheap at that.

This measure contains the single gold standard in all of its provisions and reduces all debts, public and private, to that standard. It fastens upon the country a perpetual national debt; and that man does not exist whose imagination is so fertile that he can foresee the time when the people of this country will be relieved from that debt. Yet in view of these expressed purposes of this measure, the Senator from Rhode Island wants the people to believe that he is the friend of bimetallism; but the people will not be deceived.

It is said in a Grecian fable that at one time the lion pretended that he was sick abed and wanted all his neighbors to come to see him. He is a very poor kind of a man who will not go to see a sick neighbor, and it is a poor sort of an animal who will not go to see a sick neighbor when asked to do so. The lion sent special word to the fox that he wanted him to come and see him because they had been rivals and there had been hostility between them.

The lion made out that he was upon his deathbed and wanted a reconciliation with his rival before the hour of his demise came. The fox, it is said, relented; but when he called at the lion's den, he looked at the approach and he saw all the tracks going in and none coming out. Hundreds of animals had gone down into the den, but not one had come out. The fox did not pursue his journey farther in his neighborly call upon the lion. And the people will not be deceived by tracks like these seen upon this bill that will lead to their utter destruction and not to their relief.

Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island point out the tracks that lead up from this bill to justice and equality among the people, and not try to deceive those whose backs are burdened with toil from morning until night, from year to year, and from decade to decade, into the belief that this measure is a good thing for them? It is a crime to take advantage of ignorance. Life at best is a ceaseless struggle from the cradle to the grave for the strong, and how much greater to the weak! The great millions are engaged in industrial pursuits and have little time to give to the consideration of measures like this and know nothing of them until they become laws. They should not be deceived.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator desire to conclude his remarks this evening, or would he prefer to proceed to-morrow morning?

Mr. ALLEN. I can finish in about half an hour in the morning, if that will be satisfactory.

Mr. STEWART. Would the Senator prefer to do that and let us have an adjournment at this time?

Mr. ALLEN. I should prefer to finish my remarks in the morning, if that be satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 8, 1900, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 7, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House joint resolutions of the following titles, the reference of which was by unanimous consent changed from the Committee on Ways and Means to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 61) proposing an amendment to the Constitution authorizing a tax upon incomes;

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 78) to amend the Constitution of the United States in relation to income and succession taxes; and Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 99) proposing an amendment to the Constitution in relation to income tax.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 26. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Nashua, in the State of New Hampshire—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 329. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Evanston, in the State of Wyoming—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 704. An act for the relief of the county of Custer, State of Montana—to the Committee on Claims.

BRIDGE ACROSS LUMBER RIVER, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BELLAMY. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 4000) to authorize the Southeastern Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Lumber River within the boundary lines of Robeson County, N. C.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I wish to inquire whether the bill has been reported unanimously by the appropriate committee?

Mr. BELLAMY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. And it has the approval of the Secretary of War?

Mr. BELLAMY. Yes, sir. It has been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War, and it has also been favorably reported by the committee. It is very necessary for the people of our section of country that the bill should pass. The road has been completed on either side of the stream; the bridge is ready to be put up, the iron laid on either side, and they are now only waiting for the action of this House to legalize the structure, so that it may be finished.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BELLAMY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMPILED STATUTES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, with the amendments of the Senate, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 136) providing for the distribution of Compiled Statutes of the District of Columbia to committees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Line 6, after "standing," insert "and select."

Lines 7 and 8, strike out "not now supplied therewith for its use" and insert "on the requisition of the chairman of such committee, and to each justice of the several courts of the District of Columbia, on his written request."

Mr. RAY of New York. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like the gentleman to state the effect of these amendments.

Mr. RAY of New York. In reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, I would say that these compiled laws of the District of Columbia have been already printed; a large number of copies are in the custody of the Secretary of the Interior, who has written to me saying that there is no law at present under which committees of the House and Senate can be supplied with these documents, and that legislation of this kind is necessary. He sent me a joint resolution, which I introduced, which passed the House and went to the Senate. The Senate amended it for the reason that they desire, and the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia desire, to be supplied with copies. That will take seven or eight copies. They also amend by saying that these copies are to be supplied on the requisition of the chairmen of the various committees of the Senate and of the House. In no other respect is any change made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

And then, on motion of Mr. HITT, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7941) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk may proceed to read by paragraphs.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to make a request. Yesterday morning, at the time of entering into the Committee of the Whole, when an agreement was about to be reached as to the limiting of the debate, I asked the gentleman who has charge of the time upon this side [Mr. DINSMORE] whether he had included in his calculation the amount of time that I had requested to use, and he stated that he had. Through some misunderstanding between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], that time was not forthcoming. I would like to have that time, forty-five minutes, for general debate this morning, if I can.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman submit that as a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that he may address the Committee of the Whole for forty-five minutes as in general debate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for forty-five minutes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, last week, I had occasion to offer some remarks, on what I deemed was the duty of this Government, relative to the conflict now taking place in South Africa.

On account of my time being limited, I was not able to finish my talk, and I therefore avail myself of this opportunity to do so.

Since that time the treaty of The Hague has been ratified by the Senate, and so far at least, as this nation is concerned, is the law of the land.

By that treaty, it is made the duty of the nations, strangers to the controversy, to mediate between combatants and suggest arbitration of the differences between them. The implication is plain that, upon refusal of such offer by one of the contending powers, the moral sympathy of all the nations to the treaty will be with the one willing to comply with the terms thereof, and against the one refusing so to do; and, further, a moral duty exists on the powers at variance, to comply therewith, and thus carry out the evident object of the treaty.

This duty to mediate exists in every case, irrespective of the cause of the war. With how much greater reason, then, ought the United States to offer mediation, when a gigantic power having an empire of 400,000,000 inhabitants is about to crush two little Republics, having a population, exclusive of the native tribes and outlanders, of less than 150,000 people and having standing armies, in times of peace, which aggregate less than 900 men. And how clear does it become our duty when the great power is waging a war of injustice and oppression, and the little Republics are attempting to maintain their liberty and independence.

In my remarks last week I tried to demonstrate, that Great Britain had no more right to interfere with the internal affairs of the South African Republic, than has the United States. I showed by the language of the treaties between England and the South African Republic, that the little State was as free to manage its internal affairs as we are to manage ours.

I further showed from the declarations of the Right Hon. William E. Gladstone, Lord Derby, and Joseph Chamberlain himself, that no power was reserved by Great Britain to interfere with the internal affairs of the Republic.

I now want to take up a branch of the subject, as to whether Great Britain had a right to interfere with the internal affairs of the Republic, on account of the alleged grievances of its citizens or, as some people claim, in the interest of civilization, which involves an examination into the specific complaints of the outlanders.

The right of a foreign power to make demands upon a nation, relative to its internal concerns, exists only when the liberty or property of the citizen of such foreign country is involved. And even in those cases, the violation of the right must be clear. No such right exists for political grievances, for the reason that there is no such thing as political rights in an alien. As soon as the alien is naturalized, he renounces his allegiance to his mother country, and terminates his relation therewith.

The principal grievances of the outlanders, on account of which Great Britain has interfered with the internal affairs of the South African Republic, were five.

I.

THE NATURALIZATION LAWS OF THE BOER REPUBLIC.

The outlanders complained, that the naturalization laws were oppressive, and they caused England to demand that those laws be amended, so as to permit citizenship upon five years' residence, including past residence.

The naturalization laws of the South African Republic had required fourteen years' residence, and that period, upon the complaint of the outlanders, had been reduced to seven years.

In order to understand the reluctance with which the Boers granted liberal terms of citizenship to aliens, it must be remembered that upon the discovery of gold at the Witwatersrandt, thousands of fortune seekers poured into the little Republic, and it was not long, before they far outnumbered the Boers. It is said that at the time of the commencement of hostilities, the outlanders were more than three times as numerous as the citizens of the Republic.

The great mass of the outlanders, did not go to Johannesburg to permanently reside, but to stay there only until they made their fortunes, when they expected to return to their native lands. It must not be forgotten, that the Boers had settled in the country when it was a wilderness, inhabited only by wild beasts and savage men; that their hardships and privations had been the most severe of any pioneers of modern times, and that they justly thought they had the best right to make the laws and administer the same.

It can readily be seen that to grant very liberal terms of citizenship, would result in the turning over of the Government to the outlanders; and as the English predominated among them, it would mean the transfer of the country to the British Empire.

It is not strange, then, that the Boers were reluctant to give liberal terms of citizenship to the outlanders.

Can we, the people of the United States, believe that even the most illiberal of their naturalization laws, were not justified? Can we condemn such laws, when we have upon our own statute books a law, which even goes much further—a law which absolutely excludes from our shores Chinese, unless they come for purposes of education or travel? If to have a fourteen years' naturalization law is repugnant to civilization, where do we stand with our exclusion act?

Sir, every government has the inherent right of self-preservation and self-protection. We have exercised that right in the Chinese-exclusion act, and any other nation has the same right to preserve the independence and integrity of its government. But even upon this demand for naturalization on five years' residence, as unreasonable under the circumstances as it was, Paul Kruger yielded.

But, Mr. Chairman, England contended that the law granting franchise upon seven years' residence, did not give the right to vote for a member of the upper chamber of the Volksraad, nor for the office of President, and she demanded that full franchise be given. Sir, with what grace does this demand come from Great Britain, who does not give a naturalized, or even a native-born, citizen, a voice in the selection of the members of the upper chamber of her Parliament, nor of the chief executive of her Empire? A Government that recognizes the divine right of kings, and the right only of the sovereign to appoint new members to the House of Lords, is not in a position to insist upon the extent of the franchise given by an independent nation to a foreign citizen. But, notwithstanding that, Paul Kruger yielded upon this point.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. SHAFROTH. My time is limited, but I will.

Mr. RIDGELY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Colorado, if it is not true, that Great Britain also demanded, that English subjects should have the right of franchise in the Transvaal Republic, without relinquishing allegiance to Great Britain?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I was just coming to that. The most outrageous of all the demands, was that made by Great Britain, that her subjects in the Transvaal on being naturalized, should not be required to renounce allegiance to the Crown.

What nation on earth permits a naturalized citizen to retain allegiance to his native land?

Does our Government permit it? No; we say as Paul Kruger said: If you help run the Government in times of peace, you must fight for it in times of war, even where the conflict is against the mother country. Is there anything wrong in that? Does not England herself require from every one of her naturalized subjects the renunciation of his allegiance to his native country? Of course she does. With what justice, then, can she demand a different course from the South African Republic?

Upon this point, Paul Kruger said, to yield to this demand, would be a surrender of independence, and that he would never do.

What lover of justice and fairness can fail to honor the old President of the little Republic, for this determined stand?

II.

DEMAND FOR INCREASED REPRESENTATION IN THE VOLKSRAAD.

The second demand made by Great Britain, was that the Johannesburg district, should have ten representatives, in the legislative body of the South African Republic.

Mr. Chairman, upon what ground, did Great Britain predicate her right, to demand an increase of from two to ten representatives from that district, in the Volksraad? It was upon the ground that the outlanders own the mines at Johannesburg, and pay five-sixths of the taxes of the state. When was it, sir, that England became the champion of the principle, that taxation entitled a people to representation? It surely was not during the Revolutionary war, nor was it up to 1832, when she had 56 boroughs, having a population of less than 2,000 each, represented in Parliament by 56 members, while one district having as many inhabitants and as much wealth as the entire 56 boroughs combined, had only one representative in that body.

You all remember the terrible arraignment of the British Government by Lord Macaulay, for the inequality it permitted in representation in the House of Commons. One borough, as I remember it, was represented in that body for years, when it did not even have an existence. The territory had been encroached upon by the sea until it was entirely covered with water. The only way in which a member of Parliament could be selected, was by taking a skiff with two or three persons, who had formerly lived in the borough, rowing out to where the limits of the same once extended, and there holding a mock election for a representative to the body that legislates for the British Empire.

With what consistency does it become England, to demand full representation of a district in a foreign land, to the legislative body of that country, when it has been guilty of much grosser inequalities, and when it to-day refuses to give to Ireland, the due representation in Parliament, to which it is entitled?

At the time the negotiations were going on between Joseph Chamberlain and Paul Kruger, relative to the differences between their countries, there was filed in the colonial office at London, a petition by 3,000 Dutch residents of British Guiana, which recited these circumstances: That there were 3,000 British subjects in British Guiana, and a like number of Dutch residents; that although most of the Dutch inhabitants were born on the soil, yet they were not entitled to hold an office, under either the executive, legislative, or judicial branches of the government.

Here was a grievance, much stronger than that which existed in the Transvaal, and yet this petition must slumber, as to its own colony, while England must interfere in a less equitable cause in a foreign state.

And yet, even as to this demand, Paul Kruger yielded.

III.

DEMAND THAT ENGLISH SHOULD BE USED IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Mr. Chairman, another grievance of the Outlanders, was, that the schools aided by public moneys, were taught in the Dutch language, and hence their children had to go to private schools, in order to obtain an education. They demanded that the schools, also be taught in English.

This demand was not that the English language be taught in a Dutch school, but that all the branches of the school course, be taught in English, as well as Dutch; in other words, that there be established English public schools, at the expense of the Dutch Republic.

Sir, what would we think of a demand from our Russian or Italian naturalized citizens, that a Russian or Italian school be established and maintained in our country, at public expense? Would there be a single American citizen, in favor of the same? Would we be subject to the criticism, that we are uncivilized in refusing such a demand? We must remember, that the language of the Boers, is as dear to them, as our language is, to us. We must take into consideration, the influence of a language upon a people.

Such a demand, upon the South African Republic by the English, means a great deal more, than a similar demand from any foreigners, in our country, upon us. The Transvaal is almost entirely surrounded by English colonies. Ever since fifteen years ago, when Cecil Rhodes placed the palm of his hand across a map of the southern portion of Africa, and said that it was the dream of his life, that all that territory should be British dominion, there has been danger of the little Republic, not only being forcibly annexed, but also absorbed by this mighty power. When the English, in such large numbers came into the Transvaal and openly advocated annexation to Great Britain, is it any wonder that the sturdy Boer, whose rights had continually been encroached upon, saw in the demand for the establishment of English public schools, the danger of Anglicizing the entire people, and the ultimate absorption of their Government, by the English residents.

No one, it seems to me, in the light of their situation, can blame the Boers for refusing such a demand.

IV.

TAXATION OF THE OUTLANDERS.

Another ground of complaint on the part of the outlanders, was that they were taxed enormously, because they owned the mines of the Transvaal.

It is claimed that five-sixths of the taxes of the South African Republic, are paid by the British subjects and corporations. I presume that is true. But, Mr. Chairman, the reason they pay that proportion of the taxes, is because they own five-sixths of the property in that country. The laws of that Republic are uniform, and the taxes are imposed upon the net products of all mines, irrespective as to who own the same.

The Outlanders came to that country and bought from the Boers, for a song, some of the richest mines in the world, and under the laws of that Republic, located others, at a nominal cost. Should the state not get a revenue from this great source of wealth?

The Transvaal is a barren country; its plains are arid; its soil is not fertile, and its only source of wealth, is its diamond fields and gold mines. The Boer loves his country, and looks forward to the building of a great commonwealth there. He knows that in order to do so, it is necessary that great institutions should be founded, requiring immense revenue, that fine public buildings and vast internal improvements must be constructed, at enormous cost, and a large military establishment maintained to command respect in that part of the world.

He sees that most of these diamond fields and gold mines have passed into the hands of a few corporations, whose directors and officers nearly all are citizens of, or reside in other countries, and have no common interest with him, in building up a great republic in Africa. He sees the only wealth the country possesses, being daily exhausted and shipped to foreign lands.

Instead of the proceeds returning to his country, he finds this vast wealth is used in building magnificent structures in foreign cities and gorgeous palaces on the shores of the Mediterranean Sea. In the meantime he still lives in poverty, in his unpretentious cottage. Is it any wonder, sir, that he feels that such wealth, before it is entirely exhausted, must be made to yield at least a part of the revenue, with which to build his great Republic?

The tax imposed by the Boers, was 2½ per cent upon the profits of the mines. It is an output profit tax, not a tax on the mine. When we take into consideration, that one company declared dividends to the amount of 675 per cent in one year, and another corporation made a profit of over $2,000,000 in twelve months, out of ores dug from Transvaal soil, is it possible that they should not contribute a paltry 2½ per cent, to the maintenance of the Government and the upbuilding of the State?

But, Mr. Chairman, it comes with ill grace from English citizens, to demand a lower tax. Great Britain has a colony on this continent—the brightest jewel in her crown—Canada; yet when an American goes to British Columbia or the Klondyke region to mine precious metals, he must not only pay 2½ per cent but 10 per cent of the profits of the mines. If it shows an utter lack of civilization to impose a 2½ per cent tax, how much greater lack of civilization is shown by the imposition of a tax four times that amount!

V.

THE DYNAMITE CONCESSION.

Another complaint of the English outlanders was, that the South African Republic granted a concession to a company, for the exclusive manufacture and sale of dynamite and other explosives, which paid a large revenue to the State, and resulted in doubling the price of dynamite in that country.

As dynamite was used very extensively in the mines, which were mostly owned by the English, it operated as an additional tax on the British corporations and subjects.

But, sir, has Great Britain been free from the granting of concessions? Does her past history not show innumerable instances of such grants? And did she then regard that such conduct, on her part, relegated her to the position of an uncivilized nation?

As reprehensible as the granting of such concessions may be, let us see whether the South African Republic has any reasons, peculiar to her situation, for justifying such an exclusive privilege.

It must be remembered, that dynamite, is perhaps the most violent explosive known to man; that large quantities of it and other explosives, in the hands of the enemies of the country, might be used to accomplish the destruction of its armies and citizens, and the overthrow of the Government itself.

The situation in the Transvaal was very peculiar. A foreign population, composed largely of English—the old enemies of the Boers—seemed almost instantly, upon the discovery of the mines at Johannesburg, to take possession of the country. They largely outnumbered the citizens of that Republic. They had scarcely taken up a temporary abode, before they began to openly advocate annexation of the territory to the British Empire.

In 1890, Paul Kruger, the President of the Boers, visited the magic city of Johannesburg. While there, the flag of the South African Republic, which floated over the public building of that city, was pulled down and torn to shreds.

On another occasion, upon the arrival at Pretoria of Sir Henry Loch, the British high commissioner of South Africa, President Kruger went to the station to receive him. The two were hurried into a carriage, the box was mounted by two men who unfurled the union jack, the horses were removed, and a large crowd of men drew the carriage through the streets of that city, singing "Rule Britannia" and "God save the Queen." President Kruger protested violently against such an insult to him and his country, but all in vain.

A few years later, in 1896, a conspiracy was organized by Cecil Rhodes, Dr. Jameson and others to overthrow the Republic and place the Transvaal under the dominion of Great Britain. They armed a large force and attempted to seize Johannesburg and take possession of the Government.

It was called the Jameson raid. The Germans and other mixed population of the Rand, refused to join in the war, and hundreds of English and Cornish residents fled from that city. Dr. Jameson called his countrymen who fled poltroons and cowards, and said that Johannesburg thereafter would be known as "Judasburg."

The raid failed, because of the valor and vigilance of the sturdy Boers, in defending the independence of their country. A battle was fought, and the English were defeated and captured. Instead of hanging the prisoners, as the Boer Government had a right to do, they were handed over to Great Britain, to be dealt with by that nation, as its conscience should dictate.

Is it any wonder, Mr. Chairman, that this little Republic, in order to protect itself against such a numerous enemy, within the limits of its own land, should have desired to maintain the most perfect control, of the sale of dynamite and other explosives, within its jurisdiction? Can it be blamed for wanting to keep the exclusive sale of such explosives, in the hands of a friendly company, which would not dispose of the same, except for legitimate mining purposes, and where the most perfect inspection could be made by the Government, as to the sales, and as to the character of the persons, purchasing any large quantity of the same?

Subsequent events have demonstrated, that if no restraints had been imposed upon the sale of dynamite and other explosives, today there would be in the field, in the very heart of the Transvaal, an armed force of British outlanders, which would threaten the destruction of the armies of the South African Republic.

Mr. Chairman, these are the principal grievances, of the English outlanders, against the Boer Republic. They had come to earn a living, that they could only make with difficulty, in their own land. They made money, and many of them made fortunes.

In view of their own disturbing actions in a foreign country, have they a single complaint of wrong well founded?

The subsequent conduct of the outlanders themselves, has demonstrated that their grievances were more imaginary than real.

War exists between Great Britain and the South African Republic, and yet nearly all the outlanders, other than of British nationality, not even content to remain neutral, have joined the army of General Joubert and are fighting heroically for the flag of the little Republic. Even the English outlanders themselves, are not found in large numbers, in the armies of Great Britain; and yet if they had suffered oppressive wrongs, all of the outlanders, of all nationalities, would have been in the ranks of Lord Roberts and General Buller.

What fairer proposition to England, as a last resort, could have been offered than that proposed by President Kruger, to submit their differences to arbitration? And yet it was rejected by the Imperial Government.

Then, sir, President Kruger, tired of yielding specifically to the details of the demands of the British Government, in pathetic tones, ever to be remembered by his countrymen, said, "I will yield all, all, all, except independence."

A close examination of the causes of this war, shows conclusively, that it is a war of oppression and greed on the part of Great Britain, and a war for the maintenance of liberty and independence, for the defense of homes from foreign invasion, on the part of the South African Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman from Colorado has evidently satisfied himself and perhaps many others that England is all wrong in this matter and that the Boers in South Africa are all right. Now, I want to know what remedy he proposes. What does he want the United States to do? Does he want us to interfere?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, I do not want any armed intervention. I want the United States simply to exercise the prerogative and privilege given to it by the third article of the treaty of The Hague. That article provides that powers strangers to the controversy, even during hostilities, upon their own initiative, should mediate between the contending powers with a view to a peaceful solution of the differences by arbitration.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, right there. That Hague treaty which you speak of has not gone into force and effect, has it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I understand it was ratified by the Senate of the United States on yesterday.

Mr. RAY of New York. But it is not in force until ratifications are exchanged between the different governments, is it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know the exact condition of it, but I apprehend that it must have been ratified by several of the nations, if not by Great Britain herself, as she has had a Parliament in session since the treaty was signed.

Mr. RAY of New York. Do you know of any such thing?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not; but I apprehend that every nation whose representative signed that treaty could not consider as an unfriendly act that which international law has never regarded as an unfriendly act. It is true that the United States before the signatures of its representatives reserved the right of the United States not to interfere in the internal affairs of Europe; but that was only a reservation on our part, and mediation is not interference.

Mr. RAY of New York. Has the English Government asked for our good offices in this matter?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; and perhaps she never will.

Mr. RAY of New York. Has the Transvaal Government made such a request?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It has not; but let me tell the gentleman that whenever either one of those nations——

Mr. RAY of New York. If there is a treaty which is in force, if the Hague treaty applies, will it not be time enough for this Government to act when the English Government or the Transvaal Government, one or both, asks for our good offices?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to say to the gentleman that our Government will not recognize diplomatic agents from the South African Republic, and hence there is no means for that Republic to ask for our mediation.

But there is much less cause for offense when a nation, acting independently, offers mediation than if we wait until one asks us. Then it will appear as if we were taking sides with the one that asks.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. What effect do you think this action that you propose on the part of our Government would have upon our ideas of the Monroe doctrine?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Iowa, that if intervention were made by our Government, it might interfere with the Monroe doctrine; but where mediation is extended, it is simply a request that the parties submit their differences to arbitration, not to be followed by force if refused, but simply relying upon the moral effect which would surely follow, namely, that the sympathy of all the nations, parties to the Hague treaty, would be upon the side of the one, offering to arbitrate and against the one, refusing so to do. No nation, that is a party to that treaty, could equitably refuse to comply with such offer of mediation.

Mr. Chairman, although the Boers have been successful so far in this conflict, I feel that the British arms will triumph in the end. They can not withstand the unlimited resources and innumerable men, which Great Britain can use in this war. And unless some of the powers, bound by the provisions of the treaty of The Hague, come to the rescue, you will find that in the end there will be a total annihilation, of the brave, honest people of that little Republic.

Should not the Administration, at least, use this power to establish peace between these nations, and thereby prevent the further destructive results of a bloody war? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk read as follows:

SCHEDULE A.

SALARIES OF AMBASSADORS AND MINISTERS.

Ambassadors extraordinary and plenipotentiary to France, Germany, Great Britain, Mexico, and Russia, at $17,500 each, $87,500.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I have listened with great interest to the speech of the gentleman from Colorado upon a subject that is not before the House, that is not before the country, and, so far as I know, can not be before the country upon this measure. I wish the gentleman had stated for the benefit of the country, because certainly his speech was not made for the benefit of the House, whether either of the contending parties in South Africa has asked of this Government any interference; whether the Boer Government has requested our Government to in any wise interfere by any suggestion to Great Britain, or whether Great Britain has made a like or any suggestion to our Government upon the subject?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am putting a question to you.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I could not hear it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My question is whether one of the contending parties has asked of this Government any interference.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They have not. I so stated in my talk. But the third clause of The Hague treaty says that "powers strangers to the controversy should upon their own initiative offer mediation to both parties."

Mr. GROSVENOR. But that treaty has not been exchanged yet.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It was ratified, I understand, by the Senate on yesterday.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the ratification has not yet been exchanged. We do not know what may happen before that is done.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But the moral effect would be the same.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But I want to go a great deal farther than the gentleman has. I sympathize with every nation struggling for liberty, and I hope that my countrymen here on this floor will give patient attention for five minutes to a few suggestions I want to make, supplementary to those made by the gentleman from Colorado. There was a little, peaceable people in Europe known as the Finlanders. Their nationality has been wiped out and destroyed. A greater outrage, in defiance of human rights, was never perpetrated, unless, perhaps, it was the destruction and dismemberment of Poland; and the statute of limitation never runs against a crime like that. Russia was engaged in that; the other nations of Europe stood and looked on at that.

Not only so, but recently the Greeks were sat down on by the Turks, and a terrible outrage, in my judgment, was perpetrated. The overwhelming power of a semibarbarous nation was brought to bear to crush the life out of little Greece, and it was humiliated, taken possession of by foreigners, and finally subjected to the disgraceful and degraded position of a power without any power of independence or self-control. Then the Armenians were murdered by the Turks, and all the nations of the world stood by and looked on; and my friend from Colorado, so far as I remember, was absolutely silent. Now, I have in my Congressional district some Finlanders; and I want to speak a word for the Finlanders—and I have Greeks in my district, and I have Armenians in my district. [Laughter and applause.]

I have in my Congressional district, Mr. Chairman, some Hungarians, and I want to know by what authority Austria has squeezed the life out of the glorious independence that Hungary had under Kossuth and the great leaders of that day. [Renewed laughter and applause.] I have some Polacks in my district, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Colorado to the fact that the blood of Pulaski, the brave Pole who fell at Savannah in the defense of American liberty, has never yet been avenged; and Poland has been destroyed, and the men of my district look to me to vindicate the integrity of their country. [Renewed laughter and applause.] Not that alone. If I had time—but I do not wish to trespass upon the time of the House—I could name several others.

Mr. HOPKINS. And Germany took Alsace and Lorraine from France.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And then came this great nation Germany, that in the great struggle among nations in many cases is a leader; but in the same way it took those two beautiful provinces of France, Alsace and Lorraine, and took those people away and carried them over to a country that they do not belong to, and here we are standing silently by. God Almighty is looking at us. [Laughter and applause.] Why do not we go and defy Germany? And Mr. Chairman, there are Germans in my district, there are Frenchmen in my Congressional district. [Great laughter and applause.] There ought to be something done about this.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Has there been a single word——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more, and I will not trespass any more on the time of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to have five minutes more time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly not; there is nothing to answer. Nobody can answer that any more than I could have answered the gentleman's argument. [Laughter.] It was a terrible humiliation to France when the German army came there and marched its victorious columns through the great Arche de Triomphe at the head of their beautiful street, the Champs Elysée, and camped in the woods of Boulogne and destroyed that magnificent forest, then went to the various historical places at St. Cloud and Fontainbleau and desecrated the temples of French history. It was an awful thing, and we stood by and never said a word, and there are Frenchmen in my Congressional district. [Great laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, let us rise to the occasion. Let us appoint a commission—I would suggest a commission of 25, not more than 13 of which shall belong to any one of the parties in this House; their salaries ought to be $20,000 each per annum—and let that commission go forth to the world and see what has been done wrong, and wherever a wrong has been committed against any people let them come back and report to this House whether any of the members of this House have any of those people in their Congressional district, and if they have, let us go to war at once and exterminate them. [Great laughter.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes.

Mr. HITT. I object.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I only ask for two minutes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, I have just taken from the post-office the Bridgeport Post, in which I find this quotation, taken from a speech of Mr. Bryan in the city of Hartford the day before.

It is as follows:

QUEER COMPARISON.

The speaker early reached the money question and announced his intention of speaking straight to the financiers of "This splendidly wealthy city of Hartford."

"I am conservative," he said, "and I am more conservative than Jesus Christ, who drove the money changers out of the temple because they made it a den of thieves.

"When I want to be severe I quote the Nazarene, who spoke as no man spoke, and I quote His words against the financiers of Hartford:

"'The wealth of riches choketh down the truth.'

"If I could touch upon but one question in Hartford to-day I should choose the money question. Financiers of Hartford, do not imagine that you can own everything."

The subject of free silver occupied the speaker's attention for an hour, after which he dealt exhaustively with the other issues in his usual manner.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say in reply to that single quotation that the capitalists of Connecticut are the working men and the working women of Connecticut, and that the foundation of their capital is their energy, their thrift, their economy, and their industry. They want no Mr. Bryan to prescribe the financial basis upon which their wages shall be paid. I want to say, furthermore, to the people of Connecticut from this standpoint, and to the people of the country, that they want no such proposition as I hold in my hand, presented authoritatively by one of the leading Democratic members of this House.

I will read it to you in a moment that the country may see, and the working men and the working women of Connecticut may see what would be in store for them if this man, who is "more conservative than Jesus Christ," was in power and authorized to carry out this proposition. What is it? An entire repeal of all national banking laws of the country and substitution of legal-tender Treasury notes. How issued? Under the regulations to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that is all there is of it. Talk about trusts—talk about money trusts! The entire money issue of this country to be placed absolutely, without restraint, under the control and direction of one man, to be issued and withdrawn at his will! This is the diet that the Democratic party proposes to hold out to the people of this country in the next Administration, should they be successful.

Mr. HAMILTON. Is there any method of redemption provided?

Mr. HILL. No method of redemption, no method of withdrawal, no method of issue; simply legal-tender Treasury notes shall be issued at the will and dictation of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, issued and withdrawn at his caprice; and this bill was introduced by one of the leading Democratic members of this House, not only a leading Democrat, but one of the oldest.

A MEMBER. Who is it?

Mr. HILL. Judge MCRAE, of Arkansas.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HILL. I have concluded my remarks, and they ought to convince anyone. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. That proposition is already pending. The Chair will recognize the gentleman in opposition to that motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio has attempted to turn into ridicule what a vast number of people think are violations of liberty and violations of solemn covenants on the part of Great Britain. He pretends to think that I have spoken on what I conceive to be the duty of our Government in the Transvaal conflict because that I may have some persons from Holland in my district. Mr. Chairman, I do not know of a single person from that country that resides in my district. If they are there I do not know them. When liberty is being destroyed and independence violated anywhere in the world, I can not see why it is a crime to mention it in this House. Nor will the gentleman's ridicule prevent all people who love justice and right from sympathizing with the brave, God-fearing people of the South African Republic.

The gentleman intimates that I want to declare war against Great Britain. Have I said anything in the course of my remarks that can be construed in that manner? Have I not said that there is one duty, and but one, for us in this matter, and that is to offer mediation? And have I not shown by the article in The Hague treaty that that is not only proper, but is enjoined upon the nations strangers to the conflict as a duty?

That treaty is before me. It uses the word "should" mediate. The gentleman says there have been various countries that have committed outrages, and there have been various wars, and that we did not intervene. We are not asking for intervention. We are asking for mediation.

But I want to say to the gentleman that there has been hardly a war—not many, at least, in the nineteenth century—when some nation has not only mediated, but has actually intervened. In the Crimean war there was intervention; in the Turko-Russian war there was intervention; in the Austro-Prussian war there was intervention; in the Franco-Prussian war there was intervention; and more than that, they were interventions which produced good results, without a resort to arms. The Russian army was within one day's march of the capital of the Ottoman Empire when it was stopped by an intervening power. Intervention is far different from mediation. Is it possible that we will not make some effort to have the contending nations arbitrate their differences and thereby stop bloodshed and destruction?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I can not yield; I have but a minute or two.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Just one moment. Does the gentleman know that mediation has not been offered?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know. If it has been, God bless the man who has offered it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Why does the gentleman make his statement so strong? Does the gentleman know it has not been?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mediation is not ordinarily offered with a brass band, but through the regular channels of diplomacy. The parties might reject it and the Government be placed in a most embarrassing light.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman assert that it has been offered?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I know that the kindly offices of this Government are at the disposal of both or either of the parties in this conflict.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman answer the question whether he thinks that mediation has been offered?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not represent this Government in Great Britain nor in the Transvaal. But I do believe that I have as much right and more authority to assert that our friendly offices are at the disposal of those contending parties whenever they ask it than the gentleman from Colorado has to assert that our position is one of hostility.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not say that. I simply say, here are the provisions of the treaty which says that it is the duty of some nation, strangers to the conflict, under these circumstances to offer mediation. If the United States has offered it, God bless the United States. That is all I have to say. If Germany, or France, or any other nation has done it, well and good. Such a measure is in the interest of peace, in the interest of humanity, in the interest of stopping bloodshed and the destruction of human life. And the step ought to be taken by some power. Whether in Europe or this country makes no difference.

I do not make any accusation as to whether the President is acting properly in this matter. I know that the Chief Executive of our country has grave responsibilities resting upon him and must be extremely careful in dealing with the questions presented to him. But it seems to me that at some time, before there is a total annihilation of the people fighting in that country, some Government—the United States, if no other—should through mediation ask these countries to settle their differences by arbitration.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the formal amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding to read the bill, read the following:

Consuls general at London, Paris, and Rio de Janeiro, at $5,000 each, $15,000.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether these consuls-general at London, Paris, and Rio de Janeiro have any additional compensation provided by law beyond that appropriated here?

Mr. HITT. They are restricted by the law to this exact sum as compensation from the Treasury. As Government officers they are allowed to perform notarial acts and to render unofficial services to citizens of the United States, for which those citizens can pay them, and they retain the money thus received; but all fees paid to them for official services as consuls of the United States they have to turn into the Treasury.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have seen it stated in the newspapers that these consuls-general at London and Paris are in receipt of an annual income vastly greater than that of the President of the United States. I will ask my friend whether there is any way in which the fact as to that matter may be ascertained?

Mr. HITT. The consul-general at London receives the salary indicated in the bill—$5,000; and during the year ending June 30, 1898, he received for services, notarial and otherwise, $7,323.70. Besides that, he was entitled under the law to one-half of the fees collected at the consular agency at Dover, amounting to $17.50, his proportion being one-half of that sum. Out of these amounts he had to pay a considerable sum for clerical service, because the acts enacted by Congress in past years have not provided sufficient clerical force to discharge the enormous business at the great consulates.

Mr. DOLLIVER. What are the facts as to the fees at the consul-general's office in Paris?

Mr. HITT. In Paris last year the consul received the salary in the bill, $5,000, and in addition, for notarial and other services, there was paid the sum of $8,376. There are no consular agencies, and that was all that he received. It should be stated, in justice to these officers, that the business of that office is so vast that the fees paid into the Treasury from the Paris consulate last year were $17,101.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. HITT. That will explain what I said as to the need of so many clerks. The allowance which we make in this bill for clerk hire at the Paris consulate is inadequate, as I suppose it is always inadequate at these great consulates, and the consul takes from his own compensation for other services and pays the clerks when necessarily employed.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have no complaint to make about the aggregate amount of their receipts, and I am obliged to the gentleman for making the statement, which corrects an impression which has been circulated for many years in the country that these official receipts were so great as at least to warrant an effort on the part of Congress to divert a part of them into the Treasury.

Mr. HITT. As to Rio Janeiro, about which the gentleman also inquired, I will say there is almost nothing in the way of notarial fees. The amount received by that consul last year was $372 and one-half of $290 from agencies.

I ought to add, in explanation of the popular impression, that there has been some basis for that impression in the past. Formerly these fees were very much greater than they are now. The indirect income of the consul used to be a great sum of money, and a few years ago our committee brought in a measure here that cut off two-thirds of that income, so that the income of all those great consulates is very much reduced. Everybody has heard of Hawthorne, and how that great literary man went over as consul and a fortune dropped into his lap at Liverpool by these vast fees. There have been other instances of large fees, as in London, Belfast, Sheffield, etc.; but those fees have been cut down, as I have just stated.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I suppose the notarial fees, outside of the official consular business, are regulated by local laws.

Mr. HITT. The notarial fees are regulated by an order of the State Department, which fixes in a schedule the amounts a citizen can be required to pay for notarial services, as in taking an acknowledgment of a deed, or certifying to a will. That is all set forth in an order of the State Department, which requires the list of fees to be kept posted in the consulate.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I make that inquiry for the reason that one of my constituents has complained to me that he was compelled to pay, I think, four dollars and a half for a notarial service which in this country would have cost him, probably, a half a dollar, and I was a little interested to know upon what basis these charges were regulated.

Mr. HITT. If that were done to a citizen who would submit it with the proof to the State Department, and the fee were exorbitant, it is quite probable that that consul would soon hear of it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am not prepared to say that the fees charged were not proper, because I know nothing of the service that the consul actually rendered.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact, if I am right, that consuls have urged the State Department that they ought to have the right to charge for their notarial and unofficial work the same prices that are fixed in the country in which the work is done, which, in most cases, would be two or three times greater than the table of fees allowed by the State Department. Is not that true?

Mr. HITT. That is the fact. The list of fees fixed by law in the District of Columbia is the one that is generally followed by the State Department in fixing the schedule of fees. The fees prevailing in foreign countries and the fees in legations and consulates of foreign countries in this country exceed those allowed under our laws. Our passports, for example, cost a dollar. It is not the same in other countries.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consuls-general at Berlin, Montreal, Yokohama, Panama, and Mexico (city), at $4,000 each, $20,000.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 10. While I was out for a moment the Clerk read the paragraph.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman was not present when it was read?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; I was not present.

Mr. HITT. Then I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to return to page 10, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I wish to offer is to change "two thousand" to "$5,600," and to make it read "expenses and salary of a commissioner" instead of simply "expenses."

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman either write out his amendment or state it more specifically?

Mr. HITT. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that that is subject to a point of order, but if the gentleman desires to make a statement I will not press the point, but will withhold it for a moment, so that he can make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts either send up his amendment or state it, so that the Clerk can note it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The amendment is to insert, after the word "expenses," the words "and salary," in line 19, on page 10, and, instead of "two thousand dollars," the words "five thousand six hundred dollars."

I will very briefly state the reasons for offering this amendment.

Mr. HITT. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I trust my statement will modify the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois. There is at present, as is well known, a commissioner of the United States on the International Prison Commission, who is the gentleman formerly our colleague here from Massachusetts, Mr. S. J. Barrows. I have here a letter from the Secretary of State recommending this very amendment which I now suggest, which I will read:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 3, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information and consideration of Congress, a report of the commissioner of the United States on the International Prison Commission, giving a detailed statement of his work during the past year, and of the additional work which, at the suggestion of the commission and with the approval of the Department, he has already undertaken.

The work of the commissioner is both interstate and international. The measures taken by him to solicit and diffuse information in this country concerning penal laws, methods, and agencies preventive of crime in the different States is of national value. On the other hand, the international character of the commission secures the friendly and systematic cooperation of penologists in all of the great countries of the world, and the exchange of information and experience is of mutual advantage.

The present annual appropriation of $2,000 for the commission simply suffices for the subscription of the United States and clerical and other necessary expenses. As the preparation of the reports authorized by the Department will absorb almost the entire time of the commissioner, I respectfully ask that the appropriation for the commission may be increased so as to provide for the compensation of the commissioner, and suggest the following item:

For subscription of the United States to the International Prison Commission and the expenses and compensation of the commissioner, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, $5,000.

The previous report of the commission will be found in Senate Document No. 181, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

HON. GARRET A. HOBART,
Vice-President of the United States, United States Senate.

As this letter indicates, Mr. Barrows has for several years performed the duties of his important office with great ability and fidelity, and without any compensation. The $2,000 allowed for expenses was used last year as follows:

Subscription of the United States to the International Commission	$350.00
Subscription of the United States to the Official Bulletin	50.00
Translations, clerical labor, and researches	734.79
Typewriting, postage, session laws	426.39
Expenses of commission abroad	438.82

The very modest sum appropriated by the commissioner to his personal expenses bears witness to his economy and conscientiousness, and the work he has accomplished proves his industry. It is of great importance to the country that this growing work should not be abandoned or diminished and to insure that it should be fairly compensated.

There are fourteen nations which unite in supporting this commission, and every commissioner except ours has a salary from his own government. As each of our States has its separate penal system, it is of great importance that the nation should have at least one central bureau of penal information and suggestion, where the differing systems of the States can be compared and the varying results noted and foreign developments collected. Statistics, methods, and experiments should all be gathered there, and there is constant correspondence and interchange of views and results with foreign nations. There should also be prepared a digest of the new criminal laws passed by Congress and all the States.

The Sixth Quintennial Prison Congress meets next July at Brussels, which it will be the duty of the American commissioner to attend, and he must report the proceedings for distribution in the United States in a document whose preparation involves much labor.

In recognition of the very valuable service which our commissioner has rendered in the past, and as a moderate compensation for the important work which he might accomplish this year by devoting his whole time to the subject, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, in the discharge of my duty to the committee, having been put in charge of the bill, I am compelled to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consuls general at Antwerp, Apia, Constantinople, Dresden, Guayaquil, Frankfort, Ottawa, Rome, St. Petersburg, Singapore, Cape Town (Africa), Barcelona, and St. Gall, at $3,000 each, $39,000.

Mr. RAY of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Line 24, page 11, after the word "dollars," insert the following: "and to pay the expenses of the consul at Constantinople in making special inspection of the consulates and consular agencies in Turkey, the Balkans, and Roumania, the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I will have to reserve the point of order; but I do not wish to prevent the gentleman from making his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I had no opportunity before this bill was reported to present this matter to the committee; and I trust that if a point of order would lie that it will be waived. The consul-general at Constantinople is one of the most efficient men in the service and has done a great deal to promote the interest of the service at that place and throughout Turkey. Within the last year he was directed by the State Department to make an examination of those consulates, and later on that order was revoked, for the reason that there was no money available for the purpose. It stands in that way now.

Now, this appropriation of $1,000 for this purpose, or so much thereof as may be necessary, would not necessarily incur any expense to the Government or take any money from the Treasury. It would simply furnish the money to make it available in case the State Department here see fit to order that work to be done; and at the same time, if the work is necessary and if they see fit to order it to be done, a want of funds ought not to stand in the way of that service being performed for the Government of the United States. If it in any way directed this to be done, I would not ask it, but it is entirely discretionary with the State Department and simply makes that amount of money available in case the work is required.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order, I will make one remark in response to the very reasonable request made by my friend. I think that expenditure is a just and proper one, and it was because the committee desired to provide for it that they inserted on page 6, line 14, the words newly found in that paragraph, "for inspection of diplomatic and consular offices." Below that is an appropriation which by this bill is $150,000 and which under the present law is $128,000. Now, a provision of $5,000 had been made from year to year, until last year, to provide for the inspection of consulates and embassies. Last year it was omitted; and that was the reason of the fact stated by the gentleman, that there was no money in the State Department to provide for the expenses of this consul in making the inspection, an inspection so necessary. That is the reason we have made this provision.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me a question, I am to understand that the money appropriated or to be appropriated by this bill, on page 26, under the head of "Contingent expenses of United States consulates"——

Mr. HITT. No. Page 6, line 14, "For inspection of diplomatic and consular offices."

Mr. RAY of New York. That provision will furnish the money that might be applied to this particular work, if it is directed by the State Department?

Mr. HITT. It was for that very purpose that it was inserted.

Mr. RAY of New York. It does not pay some old bills that have been carried forward?

Mr. HILL. It must be a bill incurred after the 30th of June, 1900.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then, Mr. Chairman, I think that with that explanation, and with that provision in the bill, I will withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from New York will be withdrawn. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consul-general at Monterey, at $2,500.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "two," in the first line, and insert "four." And in connection with that amendment I desire to ask the chairman of the committee upon what theory the salary of the consul-general at Mexico is made $4,000, while the salary of the consul-general at Monterey, whose territory is larger and whose duties I believe are more arduous, is given a salary of only $2,500?

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order, or reserve it, on this amendment. I will say, in answer to the gentleman's inquiry, that Monterey is a provincial office in Mexico. The City of Mexico is the capital, and the business of Monterey is not as great as the business of the City of Mexico, nor nearly as great. True, it has recently risen very rapidly. It was nothing but an agency a few years ago, then a consulate, and then raised to consul-general upon the opening of the railroad. Now, I would call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the compensation of this consul-general is not only $2,500, but that he gets half of the fees of these consular agencies.

Mr. DOLLIVER. My information is that there is practically no income outside of the salary of the consul-general.

Mr. HITT. It is over $200 in the returns, and they are incomplete.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now, I will ask the gentleman if the State Department has made any suggestion to the committee in respect to the salaries of these two great consular offices of Mexico? The consul-general at Monterey has the territory practically of the whole north half of Mexico, with duties scattered and expenses greater than are now incurred by the consul-general's office at the City of Mexico, with an income hardly one-half of that provided for the salary of the consul-general at Mexico, and that practically there is no addition arising from the fees of those supposed consular agencies which had no business.

Mr. HITT. The recommendations of the Department, which I have here, are not in alphabetical order, and I can not answer the gentleman offhand from memory as to whether Monterey has been recommended for increase or not.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will say to the gentleman that the State Department has informed me of their intention to recommend an increase in the salary at Monterey, and, anticipating the point of order being sustained, I will take this occasion to urge upon the chairman of the committee to consider the recommendation of the State Department, and, if possible, in the progress of this measure, do justice to the consul-general at Monterey.

Mr. HITT. I would be glad to give that consul and many others more ample compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois inform the Chair whether or not the statute fixes the salary of the consul-general at Monterey at $2,500?

Mr. HITT. That is the law at present, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that there is no law upon that subject except the custom and habit of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HITT. I hold the law here in my hand, Mr. Chairman. It was approved February 9, 1899, and it has been decided by the Chair many times that having been once established by the House, creating a salary, is a sufficient justification for renewing it by the committee.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Does my friend from Illinois mean to say that the salary was fixed by any general law of Congress?

Mr. HITT. It is fixed by law.

Mr. DOLLIVER. By an item in an appropriation bill.

Mr. HITT. By the appropriation bill, and that is the usage by which salaries are fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Illinois is in error in his statement that it has been held that where a prior statute has fixed the salary and an appropriation bill changes that law the item in the appropriation bill governs; but where there has been no statute fixing a salary it has been held that the appropriation bill is the law which establishes that salary.

Mr. HITT. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that there is no general law establishing the salary for this post. The post was created about three years ago as a salaried office. The salary was raised; the title was changed. It was a consular agency, then a consulate, and then was made a consulate-general,

Mr. DOLLIVER. All I ask is that it be given the dignity and emoluments that go with increased duties.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the statement of the gentleman from Illinois the amendment is not in order, and the Chair will sustain the point of order.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Consul-general at Stockholm, $1,500;
Total, $110,500.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, in line 6, after the word "consul-general," I move to insert "and secretary of legation." This is done with the assent and direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The minister at Stockholm and the consul-general both, confirmed by the Secretary of State, in a communication sent to the committee, have requested that this addition to the function of this officer be made by law, so that there may be some one at Stockholm to take the place of the minister of the United States when absent. There is no increase in the pay at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, page 12, after the word "consul-general," insert the words "and secretary of legation;" so that it will read: "Consul-general and secretary of legation at Stockholm, $1,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, after line 7, insert the following: "Consul-general at Christiana, $1,500."

And on page 12, line 8, strike out the word "ten" and in lieu thereof insert the word "twelve;" also, in line 8 strike out the words "five hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

At $2,500 per annum.
Argentine Republic: Consul at Buenos Ayres.
Austria: Consul at Reichenberg.
Belgium: Consul at Brussels.
Brazil: Consuls at Santos and Pernambuco.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Insert, in line 10, page 14, after the word "Santos," the word "Bahia."

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, this amendment seeks to place the consul at Bahia in the schedule at $2,500 instead of $2,000. I call the attention of the chairman to the fact that this increase of salary has been recommended several times by the State Department. This consulate, as relates to other consulates, is out of proportion in the allowance of salary. We have already in the preceding portion of this bill arranged for salaries to consulates in that country whose receipts are far less than at Bahia.

At the consulate at Buenos Ayres, where the salary is $2,500, the receipts are but $1,400. At Pernambuco, in the same line, the receipts are less than $1,000, while the salary allowed is $2,500. At Valparaiso, which has just been passed, the official receipts amounted last year to the inconsiderable sum of $112, while the amount allowed for salary is $3,000. At Callao the receipts last year were $948, while the salary of the consul is $3,500. At Montevideo, where the salary is $3,000, the receipts last year in fees were less than $1,000.

The living expenses at this Brazilian port, Bahia, are greater than at any of the consulates I have named. The consul is compelled out of his own purse to make provision for clerk hire in excess of the allowance of the Government, for the reason that the Government requires an English-speaking clerk; and the mercantile houses of that town offer better inducements for English-speaking clerks than the American Government offers in the shape of the salary of a consulate clerk.

Taking into consideration the greater expense of living and the fact that the money in which the consul is paid is not on a par with the money of the country in which the duties are performed, the inconsiderable increase of salary which my amendment proposes is by no means disproportionate.

I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, that the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee has the privilege of consigning this amendment to the grave by his point of order; but I inquire whether it is not true that this is the only way in which these salaries can be increased and whether it is not often done? I appeal to the gentleman to withhold his point of order in view of the enlarged duties imposed upon the consul at this post and the increased expense of living, and in view also of the fact that this increase of salary has been recommended repeatedly by the State Department.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, the remarks just made by the gentleman from Indiana contain much that I recognize as true in regard to the inadequacy of the compensation of our consular officers, especially those in these unhealthy places now under consideration. I am aware of the facts in these cases; but the duty incumbent upon our committee is laid down in mandatory form in the rules; and if the chairman of the committee should come in here and, following his own judgment, should pick out posts here and there and ask the House to make increases of salary, it would not be fair treatment. If the gentleman from Indiana has stated this case correctly, the amendment he suggests can be adopted in the Senate committee; and, representing the House, upon these statements which will appear upon the record, I will try not to be unjust in conference.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is it not true that the State Department has recommended this increase of salary?

Mr. HITT. The State Department recommended a salary of $2,500 for this consul.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, what a change has come over the majority of the Republican party! What a change has come over the spirit of their dreams! In 1861 they were engaged in a great propaganda and crusade against human slavery. Now they are backing a covenant made by General Bates with the polygamous Mohammedan Sultan of Sulu, authorizing the continuance of human slavery in the south part of the Philippine Islands. In 1861 to 1865, with their principal backing in New England, they were marching and singing as their battle hymn:

> In the beauty of the Lily Christ was born across the sea,
> As He died to make men holy, let us die to make them free!

Now their propaganda is that civilization and Christianity is to be carried at the point of the bayonet, and that in the red glare of blazing guns and not in the whiteness of the Lily Christ is "born across the sea!" What would their old leaders say of such a change? "How have the mighty fallen!" [Great applause.]

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I move a formal amendment to strike out the last word, and I would like the privilege of occupying ten minutes.

Mr. HITT. I must object to that. If the gentleman will speak five minutes he will be able upon another motion to obtain a second five minutes, and I will be willing to make such a motion. But I have been obliged to refuse these requests for additional time upon the other side, and I must be consistent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed for five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in the last Congress no one was more decided than myself in the conviction that the permanent acquisition of distant tropical territory with a large population was most undesirable. I will read one sentence from a speech I made then in this House:

> To our isolation and compactness we owe much of our security and strength; to extend our possessions outside of this continent is to extend our vulnerability; we still have undeveloped resources here sufficient to occupy our energy for another century. The great menace to our future prosperity is lowering the character of our citizenship, and to enter upon a career of imperial expansion is to break our cherished traditions, to expose ourselves to foreign complications and war, and to win a broader empire at the risk of heavy taxes, corrupt administration, and a deteriorating suffrage.

Those opinions I still hold.

I opposed expansion mainly on selfish grounds, because I thought it was antagonistic to the best development and security of our own country. Yet I thought, too, that in this case selfishness was the most enlightened and effective philanthropy, and that America could better promote the cause of civilization by purifying her own administration, assuring her own development, and exhibiting to the world an ideal example of republican self-government, than by lifting up occasional degraded people at the risk of her own security and progress.

Nor will I deny that I was somewhat influenced by the argument that in abstaining from all permanent territorial aggrandizement we were not only promoting our own welfare, but were also proving to the world the sincerity of the professions with which we began the war and exhibiting a self-restraint and magnanimity and philanthropy quite new and unprecedented in international affairs.

But the decision was against me. The President and Senate, in whom the Constitution vested the power, have legally acted, and Puerto Rico and the Philippines are ours, and how they could legally be again separated from us is already a matter of dispute among constitutional lawyers.

No party is alone responsible. Neither in Congress nor in the country was opinion at first divided on party lines. The Republicans did not even have a majority in the Senate, and if half the opposition there had voted against the treaty, it could have been rejected or modified.

The question, however, is now settled, and while the events of the past year have not weakened my first impressions, yet I now acquiesce in the decision. I recognize that the only question now before us is not shall we have them, but how shall we govern them?

Nearly twenty years ago Mr. Gladstone said in the House of Commons:

> To disapprove the annexation of a country is one thing; to abandon that annexation is another. Whatever we do we must not blind ourselves to the legitimate consequences of facts. By the annexation of the Transvaal we contracted new obligations. I must look at the obligations entailed by the annexation, and if, in my opinion and in the opinion of many on this side of the house, wrong was done by the annexation itself, that would not warrant us in doing fresh, distinct, and separate wrong by a disregard of the obligations which that annexation entailed.

And so we have legally assumed new obligations which we must meet, which it is now too late to escape; and when an inevitable task is before us I think it is wiser to spend our time and strength in grappling with its difficulties than in bemoaning them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HITT. I move to strike out the last two words, and I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, from the best information I can find I do not believe the Filipinos are capable of self-government, or are likely to be capable of self-government during our lifetime.

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly; though I have only five minutes left.

Mr. LENTZ. I want to ask whether it would not be appropriate and well, in order to get some of that information, to ask the Filipinos to send a commission to Washington of such men as they see fit to select to present their case here untrammeled and uninfluenced?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think we had better wait until we are not at war with them before we make such a request.

Mr. LENTZ. You say they are ours. We want information. Would not that be a good way to get it? Would it not be a fair way to get it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I see no objection to that, though I think the first thing is to subdue this insurrection.

Mr. LENTZ. I notice that Admiral Dewey was willing to have their help and their suggestions.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I believe that they are much like minors, that they are not capable of making a contract, that they must be the wards of some nation for a long time; and the fact that they were ceded to us without consulting the wishes of their inhabitants does not to me at all impeach the validity of the transfer. They must long be treated as minors, incapable of making valid contracts—wards of some other nation; and if we could negotiate an exchange with England of these ten millions for the six millions of Canada, I should consider the transaction at once legal and most desirable, and would gladly throw in Puerto Rico as a makeweight.

But we are at present in a state of war with one tribe of these people—a war whose existence and active prosecution were provided for by the Army bill last year—and it seems to me that some persons forget the limitations which war legitimately imposes upon both expression and conduct. That the war is most deplorable we all admit—deplorable not only for the lives and suffering and money it is costing, but for the lasting hatred it must generate. It certainly did seem at first that we might reasonably hope and expect that diplomacy would avert conflict and make us welcome as friends and protectors. But I do not sympathize with the spirit that casts on our officers all the blame and exonerates the natives. On the contrary, while I presume there may have been fault on both sides, yet after the breach has occurred, in the uncertainty and doubt and vagueness of the evidence, I do not hesitate to take the side of my own country and believe our own witnesses, and claim that the unreasonableness and aggressiveness of our opponents forced the conflict. And while the war continues—a war which the fundamental law of nations compels every citizen to support with his life, if necessary—I would not wittingly do or say anything which might weaken our force or give aid or comfort to our enemy. It seems to me bitterness of feeling has in some places led to much indiscretion of statement. The war to us seems sometimes so trifling, so far away, that we discuss it academically, as if it were in another planet. But to the men there fighting it for us, at our command, in our stead, it must seem very real and serious, and they must wonder that anyone whom they are representing at the risk of their health and comfort and life can wish for their failure or contribute to their difficulties and dangers.

Until this war is ended I for one would not like to do or say anything which by encouraging our foes might prolong the conflict a day or cause the death of one more soldier. And I incline to believe that the great majority of my constituents, whatever may have been their first predilections, recognize that now the task of governing these distant and half-civilized people is for the present inevitable, and approach it not as desirable, as easy, or as a chosen path to greatness; not with a jaunty self-confidence or an eager and greedy ambition, but soberly, determinedly—as a burden which can not be shifted, and to which they hope they may find an adaptability which has thus far never failed them.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HITT. Is the gentleman for or against the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. He has been recognized against the amendment.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I fully sympathize with the concluding remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. This country is at war. It is a serious war, and as long as that condition exists every American in this Chamber and outside of it should stand by the Government. An American army is in the Philippines, and all of us favor strengthening and supporting it as long as hostilities continue, always with the understanding that the Republican party and the President are responsible for its conduct. I believe it is the sense of this body, without regard to politics, and of the electorate all over this country, without regard to opinions, that all requisitions for the men and money necessary to the vigorous prosecution of the war should be forthcoming. Up to this hour the President has found Congress ready to act upon his mere suggestion in reference to these matters.

But, Mr. Chairman, I believe this war in the Philippines could have been and should have been avoided. As to who was responsible for the beginning of this conflict it may be that, as has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], we are in the dark. But as to the year of bloody strife that has followed, it seems to me it is not difficult to fix the responsibility. Conclusive and admitted facts stand out prominent in the discussion. When the first collision between the American troops and the Filipinos occurred at Manila the commander of the Filipinos sent representatives through our lines deploring the conflict and begging piteously for a cessation of hostilities. The Filipino commander disclaimed acts committed by privates, and offered to retire with the Filipino forces to a sufficient distance from Manila to guarantee the restoration of peaceful conditions pending a settlement of the matter by peaceful methods. Acceptance of this proposal would have restored peace. It was rejected, and the war was the result. The answer of the American general was that the conflict having begun, it must go on to the bitter end. This is the history of the outbreak as preserved in the archives of our Government.

I submit that with these admitted facts staring them in the face the American Government must admit that we, not the Filipinos, declared war. It was the general commanding our armies at Manila, who, acting, doubtless, under instructions from Washington, declined peace when peace was offered and declared that a mere brawl between the outposts of two armies which had just emerged from a successful campaign against a common enemy was to be made a pretext for a war which must go on to the bitter end.

Mr. Chairman, these cruel words, these fatal words, should never have been spoken. If we can in any way recall them, if we can end this bloody business by treating with these natives and arrive at a peaceful solution of the Philippine controversy, we ought to do it. If through its authorized agents this Government needlessly brought on the war, the great Republic should find a way to end it without going on to the bitter end—the extermination of the civilized population of the islands.

Mr. Chairman, we can afford to be generous with these people. We should take into consideration the fact that if they err in judgment it is because their judgment has been perverted by three centuries of wrong, oppression, and despotism. If they are suspicious and not willing to trust us, albeit that suspicion may be unjustifiable, still, let us reflect that it grows out of the fact that their former masters made many promises which were not kept. Three centuries of injustice, robbery, and cruelty had rendered them desperate. The overthrow of the Spaniards made them believe their dream of liberty and independence was about to become a reality. The edict of our general portending, as it did, the advent of a new master, filled them with despair. These are the facts, gentlemen, and we may as well face them. The matter most important is not who began the war, but who insists upon continuing it? No matter who began the war, we can and ought to end it.

Mr. Chairman, Republican leaders and organs say that we, as legislators, have just one duty to perform. We must stand by the President. They insist that to dare to question his judgment is akin to treason. The President of the United States was formerly an honored and distinguished member of this body. Did any member of Congress then forego his personal judgment because, forsooth, William McKinley sat here as a Congressman? He has been called to a higher civil position now. Does that add to his capacities or give greater value to his opinions? He carried with him to the office of Chief Executive every imperfection of judgment that characterized him here. He is entitled to the respect due to his high office. But when he was a Congressman he was surrounded by his equals, and not unfrequently met men who were his masters in intellectual and moral endowments. What was true of him then is no less true now. Because one member of this body has been called to a higher sphere, it does not follow that all the others should renounce the right to think for themselves. It is the duty of every member upon this floor to study every grave question presented in this body and, having done so, to pronounce his own individual judgment upon it.

This is not a one-man government. It is not a government by the President. It is a government of the people, who speak through their Representatives on this floor; and when they speak, the duty of the occupant of the White House is to obey.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RIDGELY. I ask the gentleman be allowed ten minutes.

Mr. HITT. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. What is the supreme question in this Filipino controversy? It is whether the United States shall continue in perpetual sovereignty in the Philippine Islands. Congress must finally determine that question. Why have we not entered upon an effort to do so? What stands in the way? The Administration says nothing can be done until the end of the war. In his message to Congress at the beginning of the present session the President said the war had practically terminated. The Filipinos have been scattered and driven into the hills and mountains. Only small bands of natives are now in the field. If Congress is to determine the question, what is the meaning of steps recently taken by the Executive?

The President is about to establish civil government throughout the island of Luzon. Is this not a barefaced usurpation of the powers of the Congress? If the time has arrived for definitive action, the lawmakers and not the President should act.

I insist that Congress owes it to the country and owes it to the Filipinos to declare what shall be the policy of this Government there. If we intend finally to concede to the Filipinos the same rights that are to be conceded to the Cubans—and I believe we ought to—then let us say so.

If this Congress would declare that when peace shall have been restored—when a government republican in form and capable of protecting life and property shall be organized in the Philippines—it is our intention to withdraw our military forces, retaining only a naval station, and allow the people to govern themselves, I believe that upon publication of the good tidings in the Philippines war and bloodshed would cease. Am I mistaken? Possibly. If so, no harm would result from trying the experiment. If I am right, what a blessing could thus be bestowed, not only upon the Filipinos, but upon ourselves as well.

And what do the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber propose? Why, they tell us to stand by the President. This Congress, like the last, is to be content with passing appropriation bills. Having done this, we will return to our homes. Again we are going to "give the President a free hand." At the last session of Congress this course was justified by Republicans on the theory that the war would soon end, and this would pave the way for intelligent legislation. Now, when, according to the President's message and dispatches that come to us daily from General Otis, the war has practically terminated, the majority in Congress shows no disposition to act.

How long will you procrastinate? How long is your President to be allowed to exercise the powers of an absolute monarch? Is the question involved so momentous that you feel incapable of solving it? If so, it is too important to be dealt with by a single individual. Again I declare that the mere fact that a politician has been elevated to the Presidency adds nothing to his capabilities. The Congress, and not the President, must determine finally all questions of public policy. Upon the Republican majority in this body and the Senate devolves the duty of settling the future status of the Philippines.

Gentlemen, why do you hesitate? If you have a policy—if you know what you are going to do—why do you not declare it? It is idle to bandy words as to whether our troops or the Filipinos made the first assault. What difference does it make? The war resulted. It has cost many lives and millions of treasure. It makes no difference how it began. As to who is responsible for its inauguration may be an interesting historical question, but for present purposes it cuts no figure in this case. What the country demands is that a way be found to end the conflict, and what it expects at the hands of Congress is the fearless discharge of its constitutional duties. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. Mr. Chairman, I could not hear all that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] said this morning, but I gathered enough to impress me that his remarks were denunciatory of what William J. Bryan is doing up in his country—that is, discussing bimetallism, favoring bimetallism, and condemning imperialism. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of this House just a moment to the condition of one of England's colonies, one of her gold-standard imperial victims, India. I shall read from a splendid authority, the Philadelphia North American of February 5, a leading Republican sheet. Could anything be more horrible than this? I read from this paper:

REDWING, MINN., February 4, 1900.

A letter has been received in this city from Mrs. C. C. Lenth, a missionary in India, giving an account of the famine and appealing for help. According to the letter, "The outlook is dreadful. Food and clothing are needed. The people are coming to us, and we are giving food and work to as many as we can. We give each one a cup of flour. Men work for 3 and women for 2 cents a day, the latter often with infants strapped on their backs."

That, Mr. Chairman, is the condition of that empire-ridden and colonial dependency, India; and yet the distinguished gentleman who so well represents the great Eastern sentiment derides William J. Bryan, in that he opposes imperialism and the gold standard which precipitated famine and ruin in India, and who is to-day, all over this country, opposing imperialism with that magnetic eloquence and those speeches that but few of the gentlemen on the opposite side of this House dare attempt to answer—yea, more, dare rise here and state their views, for fear that when they go back home they will have to face their records before an indignant and outraged people.

Mr. Chairman, this is not the first news we have heard from this empire-ridden colony of England. On February 19, 1897, and April 7, 1897, this great liberty-loving country, this great American country that does not believe that you can have slave and citizen, that you can have a State and a dependency under our form of government, opened wide the portals of her Treasury and gave money to the Secretary of the Navy without limit to carry food to people in India who were starving. This is not the first news we have heard of the unfortunate condition superinduced by the gold-standard combination. I read from our statutes as follows:

Whereas a famine exists in India which is daily causing thousands of deaths among the poor, which famine can readily be relieved from the surplus products of other parts of the world; and

Whereas generous people of the United States in different States are freely giving wheat, flour, and corn for the relief of the famishing inhabitants in India: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ and place at the disposal of the collector of the port of New York any ship or vessel belonging to the Navy of the United States best adapted for such service for the purpose of transporting to the famishing poor of India such contributions as may be made for their relief, or to charter and employ under the authority of the United States a suitable American steamship or vessel, with a cargo capacity of 2,000 to 4,000 tons, for the same purpose. Any sum of money which may be necessary to carry out the object of this resolution is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved April 7, 1897.

You will all bear witness that this was passed by a Republican Congress, with not a single solitary vote on this side or that cast against it. Therefore the Republicans themselves bear testimony to the wretchedness in India by reporting and passing, with the Democrats, this resolution.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. GAINES. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman attribute the famine and plague in India to the gold standard?

Mr. GAINES. I do, and to the imperial domination of England that cares not how many slaves she makes so that she gets food and raiment from them.

Mr. HILL. I want an answer to the question. Does the gentleman attribute the plague and famine to the gold standard?

Mr. GAINES. I attribute the condition of that country to England's imperial domination and monetary condition.

Mr. HILL. I would suggest to the gentleman that the famine and plague both began in India under the silver standard, and before the gold standard was adopted.

Mr. GAINES. I do not agree with the gentleman in his history of India.

I want to read now from good Republican authority printed in 1873, when there was no necessity or cause for whitewashing the effect of the gold standard.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Tennessee have ten minutes more.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments on this paragraph are exhausted. If there is no objection, the formal amendments will be withdrawn.

Mr. GAINES. Does the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. HITT. Yes; I object.

The Clerk having read another paragraph of the bill,

Mr. GAINES. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I want to read to my Republican brethren here exactly what was predicted by a Republican authority, Dr. Linderman, in 1873, at a time, unlike nowadays, when it was not necessary to whitewash the never-present and always-invisible blessings of the gold standard. What does he say? On page 481 of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1873-74 will be found this language of the Director of the Mint:

The gradual adoption of the gold standard and consequent demonetization of silver will of course be followed by an increase in the value of gold, or, what is the same thing, a decrease in the price of articles measured by it. Indeed, it is quite certain that this effect is already perceptible in some portions of Europe. * * * Now, add to the foregoing (gold requirements of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway) the requirements of France and the United States in the near future, and it will be readily understood that gold must appreciate in value.

The gold advocate says now gold does not cause "a decrease in the price of articles measured by it," and that gold has not "appreciated in price;" that silver has fallen. Here the fruits of the gold standard and imperialism are combined. Mr. Chairman, here is a frank statement of the effect of the gold standard foisted upon us in 1873 by fraud, when the American people did not expect it or demand it, passed through Congress by fraud. Why, even Mr. Blaine, who then sat in the chair as Speaker of this body, stated that he did not know when he signed the bill that it stopped the coinage of the silver dollar, and he afterwards introduced bills here to remonetize that dollar.

In another part of the same report, on page 477, I find this language:

The passing from the double standard of gold and silver and from silver to gold by the nations can not be completed without some embarrassments financially and otherwise.

The countries adopting gold as the sole measure of value have, as a necessary consequence, assigned a subsidiary position for silver. This system increases the use of gold as money and decreases that of silver for the same purpose, or, in other words, enhances the value of the one and depreciates that of the other.

Bankruptcy and starvation, it was prophesied before 1873, would follow the demonetization of either gold or silver.

Mr. Carlisle, in 1878, in effect describes India's condition of to-day. He said:

According to my views of the subject, the conspiracy which seems to have been formed here and in Europe to destroy, by legislation and otherwise, from three-sevenths to one-half of the metallic money of the world is the most gigantic crime of this or any other age. The consummation of such a scheme would ultimately entail more misery upon the human race than all the wars, pestilences, and famines that ever occurred in the history of the world.

Thus the gentleman from Connecticut now has ancient history—1873 to 1878—and modern history of the present day, clearly showing that where there are slaves there is imperialism and the gold standard; where there are colonies or imperialism, bimetallism is absent and Americanism is unknown; there we find penury, there we find poverty, there we find hunger; and the good women of that unfortunate country, that colony of England—India—are perambulating the highways and the byways begging for the small wage of 2 cents a day that their little children, strapped upon their backs like the savages of the Indian Territory, may not starve. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the formal amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the formal amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Russia: Consul at Vladivostock.

Mr. PRINCE. I move to amend by adding after the word "Vladivostock," in line 8, page 15, the words, "Switzerland: Consul at Zurich."

Mr. Chairman, the salary of the consul at Zurich, as fixed by this bill, is $2,000. The purpose of my amendment is to change this consulate from Class V to Class IV and fix the salary at $2,500. Zurich is one of the largest cities—in fact the largest city—in Switzerland. The duties of the consul there are onerous. There are many persons traveling there, especially from our own country, who call upon the consul and require of him the performance of many duties in their behalf. The trade with our country from that place in the silk industry is of importance. In view of all these circumstances it does seem to me that the salary of this consul should be increased from $2,000 to $2,500. I trust that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to raise the point of order against this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is late in raising his point of order. The amendment has been debated.

Mr. HITT. I tried to get the attention of the Chair at the moment when the gentleman from Illinois rose; but, as to the merits of this proposition, I will say that I think the amendment offered by the gentleman has a great deal of merit. I have, however, no authority from the committee to accept such an amendment; and I must ask that the point of order be ruled upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman to make the point of order after the question has been debated.

Mr. STEELE. Not upon the statement of the gentleman that he sought to obtain the attention of the Chair, but could not?

Mr. HITT. I did my duty, and I will leave the matter to the Chair. The Chair acted in good faith, and I tried to act in good faith. The matter itself is one in which we can not go wrong, even if we should follow the lead of my colleague [Mr. PRINCE].

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take what may appear to be any undue advantage of my colleague. I will say frankly to the House that I talked with him about this proposition and he told me that he would have to raise a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not see the gentleman from Illinois rise to make the point of order——

Mr. PRINCE. I do not wish to take advantage of the chairman of the committee, even to secure an advantage in favor of my proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois states to the Chair that he sought the floor in order to make the point of order——

Mr. HITT. The Chair was at the moment conversing with a member, and did not seem to observe me.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon that statement the Chair will recognize the gentleman as having raised the point of order.

Mr. HITT. And now I ask a ruling upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must sustain the point of order. The Clerk read as follows:

Germany: Consuls at Breslau, Freiburg, Hanover, Mannheim, and Zittau.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 16 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] asks unanimous consent to return to page 16 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOLLIVER. After the word "Palermo," in line 14, I move to insert the word "Genoa."

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the merit of the motion made by the gentleman. I know very well the condition of affairs at that consulate, but I must raise the point of order. While I admit that a good deal is to be said on behalf of the motion, I shall have to ask for the ruling of the Chair on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no such office created now by statute?

Mr. HITT. The office exists, but the amendment puts it in another class, and would be new legislation and a change in the salary.

The CHAIRMAN. On the statement of the gentleman from Illinois the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will continue reading the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sweden and Norway: Consul at Christiania.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, on page 20 lines 13 and 14 were stricken out by a previous amendment, to insert Christiania in the consulates-general, on page 12. That motion included the striking out of these two lines on page 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will make the correction.

Mr. HITT. Those two lines should be omitted.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, if in order, I should like to move that the salary of the consul at Batavia be increased to $2,500 per year.

Mr. HITT. I would have to make the point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cairo, Cologne, Constantinople, Huddersfield, Aarau, Mayence, Munich, Nottingham, Odessa, Para, Pernambuco, Tampico, Vera Cruz, and Zurich, at $600 each, $8,400.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting the word "Bahia" after the word "Para," in line 9, on page 22. That will increase the salary of the clerk there from $500 to $600.

Mr. HITT. I raise the point of order. That is a plain change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois state what is the existing legislation?

Mr. HITT. The statute reads exactly in the language of the bill, and the insertion of Bahia at this point would be an addition to the law. It is provided for in an entirely different manner by existing statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Berne, Demerara, Florence, Genoa, Malaga, Mannheim, Naples, and Stuttgart, at $480 each; $3,840.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of lines 17, 18, and 19, page 22, and insert the following: "Berne, Demerara, Florence, Genoa, Malaga, Mannheim, and Stuttgart, at $480 each, and Naples at $1,000; $4,360.

Mr. HILL. I offer that subject to the point of order.

Mr. HITT. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HILL. My offer is made subject to the point of order, recognizing the right of the chairman of the committee, of course, to protect his bill, and my right to offer the amendment. It provides substantially that where $480 is now allowed for clerk hire at Naples, which every gentleman knows is entirely inadequate for the clerk hire at such a consulate as that, I ask to raise it to $1,000. I leave it to the judgment of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HITT. I believe that consulate is inadequately provided with clerk hire, but I do not believe this is the way in which we can change it, after the bill is reported. I must raise the point of order.

Mr. HILL. I recognize the right of the gentleman to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, there should be a change in the footings in the note at the end of the bill, to conform to certain amendments which have been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will make the corrections indicated by the gentleman from Illinois.

And then, on motion of Mr. HITT, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7911) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

Mr. HITT. I move the adoption of the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title:

H. R. 6073. An act to amend section 4 of the act of Congress approved June 16, 1880, granting to the city of Hot Springs, Ark., certain lands as a city park, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MAHON indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present several privileged reports from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri submits a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an assistant clerk for the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I could not hear the resolution. I should like to have an explanation of it.

Mr. JOY. I ask that the resolution be read again.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Would that carry the pay back to the time that the clerk was actually appointed, or only from the date of the passage of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. That is a question that does not come up as a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JOY. I would like to state that, under the law, the pay will run from the date certified by the chairman of the committee, provided the employment was since the appointment of the committee itself, on the 18th of December.

Mr. HULL. That is all right.

The resolution was agreed to.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. JOY, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted the following, which was read by the Clerk:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an assistant clerk to his committee during the sessions of the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. JOY, from the Committee on Accounts, also submitted the following resolution, which was read by the Clerk:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be authorized to appoint an additional clerk for said committee whose salary shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. JOY, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted the following resolution, which was read by the Clerk:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to appoint a clerk for said committee, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $6 per diem, during the present Congress, until otherwise provided for.

The resolution was agreed to.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. JOY, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted the following resolution, which was read by the Clerk:

Resolved, That the chairman of the committee on Pacific Railroads is hereby authorized to appoint a clerk to said committee for the sessions of the Fifty-sixth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $6 per day.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to have some explanation of this resolution, or some reason for its passage. Has not that committee had a clerk?

Mr. JOY. It has no clerk.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Committee on Pacific Railroads?

Mr. JOY. It had none except a session clerk, and has none now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This gives it a session clerk?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will state to the gentleman that when we reported the resolution from the Committee on Accounts some time ago, instead of putting in the Committees on Education and Insular Affairs. The Committee on Pacific Railroads did have a session clerk last session; the chairman of the committee informed us that the committee wanted to have a clerk, and upon his statement to the committee and inquiry, we have given a clerk. At the last session the committee did have one, but this session, up to this time, it has not had one.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I knew that it had a clerk in former Congresses, and I supposed it had now.

The resolution was agreed to.

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES ON ELECTIONS NOS. 2 AND 3.

Mr. JOY. Also the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 88.

Resolved, That Election Committees Nos. 2 and 3 are each authorized to employ a clerk at an annual compensation of $2,000 each, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does that provide for a session clerk? Read that again.

Mr. DINSMORE. It provides for an annual clerk.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was not the intention of the committee. I call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the fact that it was intended that these should be session clerks, and not annual clerks.

Mr. JOY. I will ask that that be amended. The resolution was intended to be amended so as to read "at the rate of $6 a day."

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be considered as amended so that they will be session instead of annual clerks.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that it provides for annual clerks, at $2,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. "At the rate of."

Mr. RICHARDSON. But a session clerk gets $6 a day.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Election Committees Nos. 2 and 3 are each authorized to employ a clerk at a compensation during the present session of the House of Representatives at the rate of $2,000 per year.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend that resolution by striking out "at the rate of $2,000" and inserting "at the rate of $6 per day during the session."

Mr. JOY. I accept that amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was the intention of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this amendment will be made. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will now report the resolutions as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Election Committees Nos. 2 and 3 are each authorized to employ a clerk at a compensation of $6 per day each during the sessions of the House of Representatives, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for.

Mr. BARTLETT. It should be during the sessions of the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. WEAVER. Do I understand the resolution as amended provides for pay during the sessions of the House, or during the sessions of Congress?

The SPEAKER. During the sessions of Congress, at $6 per day.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ASSISTANT BOOKKEEPER TO SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. JOY. I also offer the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 112.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House is hereby authorized to employ an assistant bookkeeper in his office for the remainder of the present Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $75 per month.

Mr. JOY. One moment. I did not get permission of the Speaker to be recognized for that, and I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

WILLIAM A. WATSON.

Mr. JOY. I also present the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 110.

Resolved, That William A. Watson, of New York, be appointed as special messenger to serve in and about the House, under the direction of the Doorkeeper, at a salary of $1,200 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund until otherwise provided for.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw that resolution until I get leave to present it. I did not know that was in those resolutions presented to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that will be withdrawn.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I object to the withdrawal of that resolution.

Mr. JOY. I have no right to offer it, as I had not obtained the consent of the Speaker to offer it. I rose for another purpose. The resolution ought to pass; the report of the committee is unanimous that it should pass, and I could give an explanation why it should pass; but I withdraw the resolution at this time, for the reason that I have not asked the Speaker's consent to present it.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, would it not, then, be in order to ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered now? The gentleman from New York who was to ask for consideration is not here. The matter has been unanimously reported by the committee. It provides an extra messenger for the Democratic side of the House; and, inasmuch as there is no objection on the part of the committee, I can not see any objection to having the matter considered here now. I therefore ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri say that these were sent up by mistake?

Mr. JOY. These last two resolutions were sent up by mistake. I did not ask the Speaker's consent to present them at this time, but only asked consent to present those resolutions on the question of additional clerks. While I approve the resolution and think it ought to pass, I do not wish to take advantage of the Speaker of the House or the House itself by asking consideration of it until I first submit my request for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Has the resolution been recommended by the committee?

Mr. JOY. It has been unanimously recommended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts to ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be now considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the resolution may be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman whether this is in addition to the usual employees on the other side of the House?

Mr. JOY. I will answer that. During the early part of the session a resolution was presented giving annual employment to one on the Republican side of the House, at the rate of $100 a month. As an offset to that, at the request of the Democratic side of the House, this resolution was agreed to by the committee. They say it is necessary for the Democratic side to have this other messenger, and the committee agreed to the resolution unanimously. We think it ought to pass in perfect fairness to the other side of the House.

Mr. HEMENWAY. This is in addition to the employees allowed the other side of the House in this and in previous Houses?

Mr. JOY. No; one equal to this was allotted in the last Congress. It is a proper resolution and ought to pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, in fairness to the gentleman from Missouri, I think he ought to ask that the resolution which the committee directed to be reported giving an additional bookkeeper to the Sergeant-at-Arms be taken up and disposed of. These resolutions were both considered together and both directed to be reported by the committee.

Mr. JOY. I prefer to submit that resolution to the Speaker before it is presented here. I will submit it at a later day.

BINDING SENATE AND HOUSE BILLS.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit the following report on resolution No. 6, from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred resolution No. 6, authorizing the Doorkeeper to appoint a suitable person to prepare for binding Senate and House bills and resolutions of certain Congresses, as required by the act of January 12, 1895, to be paid at the rate of $2,000 per annum during the Fifty-sixth Congress, have had the same under consideration and beg to report as follows:

The printing act of January 12, 1895, requires that all Senate and House bills, joint and concurrent resolutions shall be bound. This necessitates the taking from the files of the document room one copy each of the bills and resolutions of certain Congresses for binding. A portion of this work has been performed under authority of a resolution of the House passed in the Fifty-fourth Congress. It is believed that the present force of employees in the document room is sufficient to complete the work without the employment of an additional clerk, and we therefore report the accompanying resolution adversely, and recommend that it be laid on the table.

The recommendation of the committee was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DINSMORE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the recommendation of the committee was agreed to was laid on the table.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 3 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock m.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not, the Chair lays before the Senate House bill No. 1.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Do I understand that the resolutions which lie on the table are to retain their place without speaking of it every morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That request was made yesterday, as the Chair understands, and it was agreed to. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned last evening I was discussing the peculiar attitude the Republican party has taken respecting the question of bimetallism for the last fifteen or twenty years. I had not gone into that matter extensively, and I do not intend doing so now, but I believe it to be the part of wisdom to cite the provisions of the Republican platforms of 1888, 1892, and 1896, and the utterances of the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the position of President of the United States.

The Republican platform of 1888 contained the following plank:

> The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

That was during Mr. Cleveland's first Administration. Just what that gentleman had done at that time to demonetize silver I do not recall, unless by a letter written by him to some parties in New York he expressed hostility to free coinage. This attitude of the leader of the Democratic party was severely condemned by the Republican party in its national convention, and if I am correctly informed the present occupant of the White House drafted the resolution I have just read.

In 1892 the Republican platform contained the following plank:

> The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of gold, silver, or paper, shall be at all times equal.

Mr. President, in this there is an express declaration, and a truthful one, too, that the American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism. Up to 1892 that fact had not been seriously questioned by any political party, and had been reaffirmed from time to time by political organizations as the subject seemed to demand their attention. Here it said:

> The Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals, etc.

Mr. President, the Republican party at that time pledged itself to domestic bimetallism. Bimetallism was to be promoted by legislation, not by international agreement. From that time to this moment the Republican party, although in power in this Chamber and in the other branch of Congress, has never caused to be introduced a bill for the restoration of silver or attempted by legislation to restore it to the place it formerly occupied. In other words, while pledging itself to both gold and silver as standard money and to securing the parity of the two coins by legislation, it has done nothing to promote or secure it by legislation.

Now, Mr. President, if an individual should make a promise, and upon the strength of it secure the assistance of another, which he never fulfilled and never intended to fulfill, that would be regarded as reprehensible in morals. What, then, must be said when a great political party promises in its platform, to secure the people's votes, a thing it does not intend to fulfill? That the Republican party has done that exact thing can not be and is not disputed.

And, Mr. President, as though to set at rest the position silver was to occupy, this platform declared in favor of gold and silver as standard money. I admit that from my standpoint it is difficult to distinguish between standard money and any other kind of money; but assuming that such a distinction exists, what was intended by that expression was that gold and silver were to be used as redemption money; that they were to be placed upon an equality, gold as good as silver and silver as good as gold; and that they were to be used interchangeably and indiscriminately in the redemption of the different forms of paper money put in circulation by the Government.

Instead of undertaking to make both gold and silver standard money there has been a constant, a sustained, and, I regret to say, there will be, in my judgment, a successful effort to dishonor silver and to make gold the single standard, thereby presenting the singular fact that a great political party in the closing hours of the century has been guilty of obtaining the votes of the people by gross frauds and false pretensions.

Mr. President, this matter does not end there. In 1896 the Republican party shifted its position a little. It had been given to understand, I suppose, by those who shape the financial affairs of the nation, that it would not receive the support and encouragement of the moneyed interests of the country if it continued to advocate the free coinage of silver; and so becoming a party of cowardice rather than of courage, the party turned its face at the critical hour of danger and yielded without protest and without contest to the demands of this interest. After declaring that it was opposed to the domestic coinage of silver and in favor of the gold standard until such time as international bimetallism could be accomplished, it said:

> We are therefore opposed to the free coinage of silver except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such an agreement is obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved.

I have pointed out that nothing has been done to promote international bimetallism. I called attention to the fruitless journey of our commissioners shortly after the inauguration of the President, and how when they were engaged in the most delicate negotiations to bring about international bimetallism the Indianapolis conference, the gold-standard conference, the President, the Republican press, and the Secretary of the Treasury were discrediting them in their work and declaring that the Republican party was committed to the gold standard.

It would seem that the Republican party is contented with that insincere and abortive attempt.

I have myself no doubt of the utter good faith of our commissioners, of their earnest work in that behalf, nor have I the slightest doubt that their efforts were neutralized and rendered ineffectual by the deliberate plan at home to discredit them and their efforts.

The President, in his letter of acceptance in 1896, used this language:

> The Republican party has declared in favor of an international agreement, and if elected President it will be my duty to employ all proper means to promote it.

And the only means employed, the only thing done, to bring about an international agreement, as I have said, was the appointment of commissioners, who had no sooner left our country and gone abroad than they were discredited at home. The junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], the chairman of the monetary commission, felt the force of this situation in this country, and in his remarks in this Chamber on January 17, 1898, gave utterance to these words:

> We were also somewhat embarrassed by the statements of representatives of the New York bankers in England, who sought access to English officials and assured them that any sentiment which had formerly existed in the United States in favor of bimetallism was dead; that the commission was sent solely as a sop to a few far Western Republicans; that the country generally favored the gold standard, and that the President of the United States shared this view.
> The statements were untrue, of course, but in support of them these people assumed to present interviews and statements of the Director of the Mint, a hold-over from the last Administration, the late Comptroller of the Currency, an equally precious legacy, now out of the public service and translated to a Chicago bank, and pretended statements in letters and interviews from the Secretary of the Treasury to the effect that there was no chance for international or other bimetallism and favoring the permanent adoption of the gold standard. Nobody in Europe cared a rap what the two minor prophets thought or said, as nobody in this country cares, but the alleged statements of the Secretary were a different matter. * * * In my opinion, the great majority of the members of the Republican party are bimetallists, and the fact that they are misrepresented by a Cabinet officer is not pleasing, but endurable.

That is the language of the chairman of the commission sent abroad to negotiate international bimetallism, and that gentleman said in his remarks on his return from Europe that the plank with the promise of international bimetallism was represented by bankers and others abroad as a sop thrown out to catch Western Republicans. What is the meaning of "sop thrown out to catch Western Republicans?" It means no more nor less than that it was a promise made with the intention of breaking it or of never fulfilling it. It is a polite way of expressing the fact that it was an intentional falsehood on the part of those who inserted it in the platform and of those who represented it to the country.

On the 28th of January, 1898, but two years ago, the President, in his remarks at a reception in the city of New York, used this language:

> It will not suffice for citizens nowadays to say simply that they are in favor of sound money. That is not enough. The people's purpose must be given the validity of public law.

And in his annual message of last December he said:

> While there is now no commercial fright which withdraws gold from the Government, but, on the contrary, such widespread confidence that gold seeks the Treasury demanding paper money in exchange, yet the very situation points to the present as the most fitting time to make adequate provision to insure the continuance of the gold standard and public confidence in the ability and purpose of the Government to meet all its obligations in the money which the civilized world recognizes as the best.

The President was not always a gold-standard man. There was a time when in the other House of Congress he was the foremost advocate of bimetallism; there was a time when he condemned the Administration of another gentleman for trying to commit the country to the gold standard. On June 14, 1890, in the House of Representatives, the Hon. William McKinley said:

> I am for the biggest use of silver in the currency of the country. I would not dishonor it; I would give it credit and honor with gold. I would make no discrimination. I would utilize both metals as money and discredit neither. I want the double standard.

Mr. President, it is impossible for language to be plainer than this language of that distinguished gentleman. He decried the policy of discrediting either gold or silver. He wanted them to stand upon an equality as the money of our nation.

When did the President change his opinion on this important subject? When did the scales fall from his eyes, and when was he made to see that bimetallism was wrong and the gold standard right? What argument was used, and by whom was it used, to convince him that his life service to the cause of bimetallism was an error, that he should retrace his steps and become the foremost advocate of the gold standard? What was there in the history of the country, in our financial or in our industrial conditions, to produce this remarkable change? Nothing, Mr. President; absolutely nothing.

I am not prepared to say that this is not the honest conviction of the President. I would not do that, for I recognize in him the right and duty to change if subsequent events convinced him that his former position was wrong. But I submit that whenever a man changes the convictions of a lifetime upon any public question he ought to be bold and brave enough to stand before the world and admit it, and say why he changed, and give his reasons for doing so. But the President has said nothing and has given no reason for this remarkable change of front.

At Akron, Ohio, in 1891—I can not give the exact date—the Honorable William McKinley, in a public speech, used this language in speaking of the gentleman who was then President of the United States:

> During all his years at the head of the Government he was dishonoring one of our precious metals, one of our own great products—discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold. He endeavored, even before his inauguration to office, to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and afterwards and to the end of his Administration persistently used his power to that end. He was determined to contract the circulating medium and demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce, and therefore dear.
> He would have increased the value of money and diminished the value of everything else—money the master and everything else the servant.

Mr. President, how aptly this language applies to the attitude of the present President of the United States! If the Hon. William McKinley in 1891 was capable of delivering such a philippic against his predecessor for an attempt to demonetize silver; if he was then convinced that his predecessor was determined to make gold the master and everything else its servant; if he then believed that the adoption of the single gold standard would bring want and misery to the country, what has taken place since then to convince him to the contrary, and when did it take place? Why does he not give the country the benefit of his reasons for this remarkable change of opinion? Yet he says nothing, and those who represent him are silent when this question is called to their attention.

In that speech the President went further and said:

> He was not thinking of the poor then. He had left their side. He was not standing forth in their defense. Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money; the sponsor and promoter of these professing to stand guard over the poor and lowly. Was there ever more glaring inconsistency or reckless assumption? He believes that poverty is a blessing to be promoted and encouraged, and that a shrinkage in value of everything but money is a national benediction.

Mr. President, how aptly these words apply to the present occupant of the White House! But to expand upon this view or to enlarge upon this utterance of the President will serve no useful purpose. When we appeal to our friends upon the other side of the Chamber to inform us why the President of the United States has changed his convictions upon this subject, what reason he had for doing so, they are silent. There is no response to the inquiry; and, Mr. President, in my judgment there is no intention upon that side of the Chamber to enlighten the country respecting this thing. This bill, sir, is to be driven through by mere machine force, by mere force of numbers, regardless of the proprieties of the occasion, regardless of reason or of logic.

What is to be gained by the adoption of the gold standard? We are complacently told that it is the money of civilization; that all the great civilized nations, or great powers, to use a popular expression—an expression popular in this Chamber, but which ought to be offensive everywhere—have gone to the gold standard, and therefore it is necessary for us to do so.

Mr. President, there have been more panics, more financial disasters, more lockouts, more strikes, more depression, and more wrong during the existence of the gold standard in this country than in all the eighty-one years of domestic bimetallism.

Gold is not the money of civilization. There is nothing in the nature of gold that makes it superior to silver as money; there is nothing in silver or gold that makes them superior to a limited volume of full legal-tender paper money. If anything can be said to be at rest and free from discussion, it is that money is a creation of law, simply and solely a creation of law, and that any material that can be limited, that is not easily counterfeited or easily destroyed, can be used as successfully for money material as gold and silver. But I shall not discuss that question at this time.

Within a few weeks we had a financial panic in New York, and call money ran up to 168 per cent, I think.

Mr. TELLER. One hundred and eighty-six per cent.

Mr. ALLEN. One hundred and eighty-six per cent the Senator says. The Secretary of the Treasury was compelled to go to the aid of the bankers of New York to stop the panic. We seem to have fallen into the notion that every time the bulls and bears of Wall street get into a fight among themselves and undertake to destroy each other, it is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to go to their assistance and to afford them financial relief; and I suppose we shall be told before this discussion ends that this course is proper, that the Government should do so because to settle the money market of New York is to incidentally relieve the people of financial stress.

Sir, there never was a tyrant upon the face of the earth who did anything that was wrong that he did not have an excuse for it. Discretion, unlimited discretion, is the first demand of every tyrant who has disgraced the history of the world. Unlimited power in the Secretary of the Treasury, without let or hindrance or check, to issue the bonds of the people of this country in unlimited sums is the first step to a perpetual national debt, and will rob the people of the power to interpose checks through Congress, their duly constituted authority; and this measure intends to and does give precisely that power.

I ask any gentleman on the other side—and I direct my question specifically to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] who sits near me—I ask that Senator, as the representative of his party and as chairman of the Committee on Finance, Is there any check in this bill upon the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds except his mere discretion and caprice?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly there is.

Mr. ALLEN. Where is it?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is too big a question for me to answer categorically, but every provision in regard to the issue of bonds is limited for a specific purpose and can only be used for a specific purpose.

Mr. ALLEN. That is no answer at all, but it is about the answer I expected to get; and I am not disappointed by it. "Whenever and as often" is the language of your bill, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, he may issue bonds and sell them upon the market.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no; there is no such thing in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Read the provision, and that will show.

Mr. ALLEN. I will put this bill in the RECORD as a part of my speech, and the people can read it and see for themselves.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the safer way.

Mr. ALLEN. They will read that provision which applies particularly to the gold reserve. That is where the language is used. I will not occupy the attention of the Senate in reading it at this time. The Senator has it in front of him; and if he will turn to the provision respecting the gold reserve he will find the language I have quoted.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator's speech.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator does not want that language in the RECORD, Mr. President.

Now, what check is there to be placed upon the Secretary of the Treasury? None whatever. Of course the mere ipse dixit of the Senator from Rhode Island is not going to be taken in opposition to the plain provision of the bill. There it stands, Mr. President, written in words so plain that no man can be deceived by it.

Whenever a raid shall be made upon the Treasury, upon the gold reserve, and that has become reduced to $50,000,000, then the Secretary of the Treasury, as often as he may see fit, and at his discretion, may issue bonds without limitation to supply that deficiency. You have turned the whole power of controlling the financial policy of this nation into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, who, according to precedent, has been dictated to heretofore by the national banks; and it is not conceivable that any man will occupy that position in the future, if matters continue as they have been, unless he is a national banker or the servant or agent of such institutions and more friendly to them than he is to his country.

But this bill is to go through, I suppose. The decree has gone forth. Every effort will be used to strengthen the weak places, if there are any weak places in your lines, and every vote that can be obtained by the party whip, by threats, and by cajolery will be obtained to pass it through speedily and have it signed and become a law.

It is said the American people can stand anything; and, in a general sense, I think that is true, but I know of no people or the people of no nation who could stand the direful consequences which must flow from the enforcement of this bill if it shall become a law. The back of labor must be bent a little lower, the lines of care must be driven a little more sharply into the features of those who toil, and their state of civilization will be lowered rather than raised. We are to raise up a great army of industrial and agricultural serfs to dig out of the soil and to carve out of wood and iron by their daily toil the money to pay the idle and indolent class of bondholders; and one of the arguments used and urged most strongly by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island in behalf of this bill—and I noted the peculiar smile of intelligent joy which lighted his face at that time—is that it is to furnish an easy, safe, and reliable investment for those who have money to invest.

That was one of the arguments used in favor of it, and I think the chief argument—certainly the chief argument that I remember—and the Senator from Rhode Island seemed to think that the country ought to be grateful to him that he had devised a scheme that would take millions out of the masses of the people and make them contribute to the incomes of the idle few, and that we were providing a safe and an unlimited means of investment for those who had money to invest. The Senator seems to be committed to the idea that a national debt is a national blessing.

Mr. President, a nation is like a business man in some respects. A business man who gets out of debt and stays out will meet with greater success than the one who is constantly getting into debt, for indebtedness eats out the earnings of the debtor every year for interest and other charges. And so it is with a nation, for a nation is merely an aggregation of individuals. Whenever a nation can get out of debt, it should remain out, unless some great unforeseen event should compel it temporarily to tax its credit.

But the Senator from Rhode Island seems to think the country ought to be congratulated upon the fact that its credit is to be extended and taxed anew, and we are told that this will increase our credit at home and abroad. No man has ever questioned the credit of the United States, and no man ever will question it unless blind partisanship, so frequently miscalled statesmanship, shall cause the issuance of bonds and the increase of our debt to such an extent that the taxing power will not produce revenue enough to pay the interest on our obligations.

Why do you not return to the first principle of finance? Why do you not permit the power to issue money to rest in Congress, where the Constitution places it? Why do you turn this power over to less than 4,000 corporations of the country? Why do you place in the hands of a mere executive officer, in one man, the power to increase the indebtedness of this nation without limitation? These questions are unanswered and will remain unanswered by you.

Mr. President, there has been no claim in the argument thus far that the bill is calculated to promote the interests of the common men of this country. It is a surrender, an unconditional surrender, to the money power, and is in keeping with that other course of business, which has been exploited to its full extent within the last few days, of wedding the Treasury of the United States to the national banks. Gold is to be made the single standard and silver is to be stricken down and taken out of circulation, except as subsidiary coin.

The greenbacks and the Treasury notes and every other form of Government paper money are to be taken out of circulation and destroyed by this measure, and the void is to be filled by the issuance of a thousand million dollars or more of national-bank notes. When the population of this country shall expand, as it is daily expanding; when thirty years shall have rolled around and the population of the country shall have increased 50 per cent and there is necessity for an enlarged volume of money, the bonded indebtedness of the nation will keep pace with the growth of population, and the national-bank currency, instead of being a thousand million, will be two thousand millions. These great organizations can then form more effectively than in the past—and they have been quite effective in the past—a solid political organization, designed to control the politics of every State and Territory in the Union.

Mr. President, there was a time in the history of this country when there was some statesmanship in Congress, when, at least, there was an attempt to enact laws in the interest of all the people. There has been a decadence in this respect. We have reached the time when men high in public life, to preserve their own political fortunes, are compelled to remain silent on measures passed by Congress that ought to be spurned from its doors. This bill is a withering curse and should be universally execrated.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I propose to discuss briefly House bill No. 1 as it came to us from the House of Representatives, and then to discuss the proposed amendments of the Senate Committee on Finance.

Section 1 of the House bill makes the gold dollar of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine and one-tenth alloy, being 23.22 grains of pure gold and 2.58 alloy, the standard unit of value.

It makes a standard unit of value without any coin to represent it. English, "you know," after the pound sterling, which has never been coined. A unit of value which the people can never see or use.

Section 2 makes all the interest-bearing obligations of the Government for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes or greenbacks, and all Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, payable in the gold coin defined in the first section—the gold dollar—and then declares "all other obligations, public and private, for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in said section"—that is, section 1. What does "shall be performed in conformity with the standard established in section 1" mean? It is compulsory, and can mean only, shall be paid in the gold coin defined, authorized, in section 1.

Then after this plain, compulsory requirement of payment of all obligations, public and private, in gold coin only, regardless of the provisions in the face of such obligations authorizing payment in gold and silver coins or in greenbacks or lawful money, this section 2 provides that—

> Nothing herein contained shall be construed or held to affect the present legal-tender quality of the silver dollar or of the subsidiary or minor coins or of the paper currency of the United States or the laws making national-bank notes receivable and payable for certain public debts and dues and obligations between national banks.

Such unqualified, unblushing legislative repudiation of existing laws and obligations, public and private, has never before been proposed or attempted in the whole financial history of our country.

Of the $1,026,772,320 of interest-bearing bonded indebtedness now outstanding, $828,056,150 of the bonds issued under the laws of July 14, 1870, and January 14, 1875—the resumption act—have written in plain American language in their face these words: "Redeemable * * * in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin," which the law required to be inserted in their face. No one has ever denied or can deny that the "coin of standard value" was then the standard silver dollar of 412½ grains of silver and the gold dollar of 25.8 grains of gold, both nine-tenths fine.

Of the noninterest obligations we have $346,681,016 in United States notes or greenbacks, redeemable in standard silver dollars equally with gold, and $88,320,280 in the Treasury notes of July 14, 1890, issued for the purchase of silver bullion, which law required that the Secretary of the Treasury "shall coin of the silver bullion purchased under this act as much as may be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for." Beyond question these Treasury notes can be lawfully and properly redeemed in silver dollars.

These laws and the obligations issued thereunder and the plain provisions written in their face are repudiated and nullified. Still worse, if possible, all obligations of States, municipalities, corporations, and individuals which call for the payment of money, whether the money specified therein is silver dollars or merely dollars or lawful money or United States notes, or any other equivalent for dollars, are repudiated, nullified, and the debtors made to pay gold coin only. In short, all payments of money must be made in gold coin, although the parties to the contract or obligation may name and even require the payment to be made in silver dollars or greenbacks or lawful money. It is no answer to say that such payment in gold coin is in as good or better money than that specified. It may be as good, and yet it may cost much trouble, annoyance, and delay, and even many additional dollars, to the debtor to get the gold coin with which to pay.

It destroys the freedom of contract between individuals and practically prohibits them from making anything but gold payable on contracts or obligations, and gives to the creditor a ruthless power over his debtor.

It is in direct conflict with and plain violation of our Constitution, which guarantees to every State the right, the power, to make gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts. The Constitution is plain. It says:

> No State shall * * * coin money * * * or make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts.

Beyond question this clause grants to every State the right to make gold and silver coin, not gold or silver coin, a tender in payment of debts.

The provision in this section 2 that "nothing shall be construed or held to affect the legal-tender quality of the silver dollar" is a trick of legerdemain—a slight of the pen performance. It professes not to affect the legal-tender quality of the silver dollar, and yet there is no kind of obligation for payment of money, public or private, in the payment of which it can be used as a legal tender or in the payment of which the greenbacks can be used, not even Government obligations or liabilities of any kind whatever. When once the silver dollars go into the Treasury, or greenbacks go into the Treasury, they are there forever impounded and held, and can never be paid out or issued in payment of any obligation, liability, or debt of the Government existing or hereafter created.

For thus saith this bill: "Obligations, public and private, for the payment of money, shall be performed (paid) in conformity with the standard established in section 1"—the gold dollar. All the Government can do with the silver dollars is to pay them out on presentation of silver certificates calling for so many silver dollars. And all it can do with the greenbacks is to issue and pay them out to persons willing to accept them.

There is no express authority given in the House bill to reissue them. The individual citizen can do nothing with either silver dollars or greenbacks—can pay no debt or obligation existing or hereafter created, either to the Government or to an individual, except as the Government or individual may voluntarily accept them.

Why shall such iniquitous legislation be enacted? In whose interest is it?

Is it in the interest and for the benefit of the great producing classes of our country?

How can they be benefited by such legislation? I challenge you to show how the great majority of our people can be benefited by this proposed legislation. It is easy to see how largely the holders of accumulated wealth, the owners of bonds, mortgages, and debts of our nation, States, municipalities, corporations, and individuals will be benefited. All such obligations are made payable in gold coin only, while fully one-half of the legal-tender money of the United States is deprived of that quality and right and can no longer be used to pay such liabilities. In truth and verity, the rich are made richer and the poor poorer.

Section 3 creates under the United States Treasurer a division of issue and redemption to keep all records and accounts relating to issue, redemption, and exchange of the several kinds of money. To this division there is to be transferred from the general fund in the Treasury of the United States and to be taken up on its books as a redemption fund the gold coin and bullion represented by outstanding gold certificates, the greenbacks or United States notes represented by outstanding currency certificates, the silver dollars represented by outstanding silver certificates, and the silver dollars and silver bullion represented by outstanding Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, and an amount of gold coin and bullion as a reserve fund equal to 25 per cent of the amount both of the United States notes or greenbacks and Treasury notes issued under act of July 14, 1890, outstanding, the gold and silver coins transferred from the general fund in the Treasury to be increased or diminished in accordance with this act and in no other way.

Supposing this bill to have been the law January 1, 1900, the following would be the operation: There would be transferred from the general fund in the Treasury to this division of issue and redemption $161,122,797 in gold coin and bullion, representing outstanding certificates in the general fund of $236,909,230 in gold coin and bullion; $11,980,000 United States notes, represented by currency certificates, act June 8, 1872, leaving $16,431,651 United States notes in the general fund; 395,040,816 silver dollars, representing outstanding silver certificates, leaving 10,740,478 silver dollars in the general fund; and $86,934,351 in silver dollars and silver bullion, representing United States Treasury notes outstanding, leaving $1,385,929 in such Treasury notes or silver bullion in the general fund; and, finally, an amount of gold coin and bullion equal to 25 per cent of the amount of both greenbacks and Treasury notes outstanding, which would be $101,300,929 in gold coin and bullion as a reserve fund, a gold-reserve fund, to be increased or diminished only as provided in this act, and leaving $135,608,301 in gold coin and bullion in the general fund. The operation completed, there would be left in the general fund in the Treasury $164,161,359 of all kinds except subsidiary coins and national-bank notes.

Section 4 prescribes the modus operandi between this division of issue and redemption and the general fund in the Treasury to maintain intact the gold reserve fund.

To do so the Secretary of the Treasury may transfer to this gold reserve fund any moneys in the Treasury not appropriated, or may exchange any funds in this division for other funds in the general fund in the Treasury, and, in addition, whenever in his judgment it is necessary to maintain the gold reserve fund, he can issue and sell United States bonds bearing not exceeding 3 per cent per annum interest, payable in gold coin at the end of twenty years, but redeemable in gold coin at the option of the United States after one year. These are the three methods to maintain intact this precious gold reserve fund.

This section then particularizes what further acts the Secretary may do or not do. No transfer shall be made from the general fund in the Treasury to the issue and redemption division which will reduce the general fund below $50,000,000 gold. Now, we have two gold reserve funds, remember—one in the division of issue and redemption and one in the general fund of the Treasury—and that in the general fund of the Treasury must not go below $50,000,000, and that in the issue and redemption division must be 25 per cent of all the outstanding greenbacks and Treasury notes. The United States notes and Treasury notes presented for redemption shall be redeemed in gold coin at the will of the holder, and silver certificates shall be redeemed in accordance with existing law.

What is that? Upon their face that they would be redeemed in silver dollars, which had been deposited in the Treasury and upon which certificates had been issued. That may be the meaning or it may not. That will depend upon the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary is required to use the reserve fund in maintaining at all times the parity—sweet-sounding word to the gold-standard advocates—and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the Government, and if he deem it necessary to so maintain such parity and equal value of all the money of the United States, he may exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States.

That embraces everything on top of the face of this green earth coined, issued, or put into circulation by authority of the United States. There can be no mistaking this language. The word "certificates" here not only embraces the currency certificates to which I have referred, but the silver certificates as well.

The notes and certificates—mark these two words, "notes and certificates"—so redeemed or exchanged shall be held in and constitute a part of the redemption fund, but shall not be withdrawn therefrom nor disbursed except in exchange for an equivalent amount of the coin in which they were redeemed or exchanged. Nothing in the act to repeal the requirement of the act of July 14, 1890, that "no greater or less amount of such notes shall be outstanding at any time than the cost of the silver bullion and silver dollars coined therefrom then held in the Treasury purchased by such notes."

Sections 5, 6, and 7 authorize the silver bullion in Treasury to be coined into subsidiary coins and an equal amount of Treasury notes retired and canceled, the recoinage of the worn and uncurrent subsidiary silver coin in the Treasury, and the repeal of any limitation on the amount of subsidiary silver coins to be issued—I think that is a very good provision—and require all greenbacks and Treasury notes hereafter issued or reissued to be of denominations not less than one dollar, and all silver certificates hereafter issued or paid out are to be in denominations of one, two, and five dollars. Large notes for the gold aristocracy, the bank aristocracy; greenbacks and silver certificates for the masses, the toiling millions—class distinction among our people created by class distinction in your law. The financial scheme is in operation. It is in operation now.

In the division of issue and redemption we now have an amount of gold coin and bullion equal to all outstanding gold certificates, United States notes equal to the outstanding currency certificates, standard silver dollars equal to outstanding silver certificates, and silver dollars and bullion equal to outstanding Treasury notes, and the gold-reserve fund equal to 25 per cent of all outstanding greenbacks and Treasury notes, now aggregating over $405,000,000. And the gold reserve fund must be maintained intact in this division, while at the same time the gold in the general fund of the Treasury must not be reduced below $50,000,000 of gold. It is now $135,608,301; its minimum, $50,000,000. United States bonds are the dearly loved objects of the holders of accumulated wealth, and every proceeding necessary to secure them will be taken. And the Secretary of the Treasury has full power in his discretion to issue and sell them, bearing interest not exceeding 3 per cent at par, above or below par, or at any sum he may be willing to accept for them.

There is no limitation, no restriction in the bill in regard to the amount that he shall accept in payment of the bonds, and he is required to use the gold reserve fund to maintain at all times the parity and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the Government, which necessarily includes greenbacks, Treasury notes, silver dollars, and even silver certificates, payment of which may be demanded in gold. Remember also that the national banks, with the increase of their circulation, must necessarily largely increase their gold reserve.

Now, sixty millions of greenbacks and Treasury notes, either or both, are presented to this division of issue and redemption, and gold asked and paid, and the gold reserve reduced to forty-one millions, and the sixty millions of United States notes are exchanged from the redemption division to the general fund in the Treasury, and being in the Treasury the redemption fund is reduced 25 per cent of the sixty millions, or fifteen millions, leaving it at eighty-six millions intact, and forty-five millions are transferred from the general fund of one hundred and thirty-five millions of gold to restore the reserve fund intact at eighty-six millions, and thus the gold in the general fund is reduced to ninety-five millions. Progress to bonds is made. Another raid is made.

Sixty millions of silver dollars or silver certificates are presented and gold payment demanded. Thereupon, to maintain the parity and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the Government, sixty millions of gold are paid out of the gold reserve in the redemption division, and it is then reduced to twenty-six millions, and to restore it back to eighty-six millions intact sixty millions of gold in the general fund of ninety-five millions in the Treasury are exchanged with the redemption division, and the general fund in the Treasury reduced to thirty-five millions, fifteen millions below its minimum, which must be raised.

Now, forty millions of greenbacks are presented for redemption in gold and redeemed out of the eighty-six millions of gold in the redemption division—now reduced to forty-six millions; and if the forty millions redeemed greenbacks are transferred to the general fund in the Treasury and remain there, then the redemption division would only require thirty millions in gold from the thirty-five millions in the general fund to raise it to seventy-six millions—25 per cent of all outstanding greenbacks and Treasury notes, and the general fund of gold in the Treasury would be reduced to five millions, forty-five millions below its minimum, and bonds would be issued and sold at whatever price the Secretary, in the emergency of maintaining the parity and equal value of all the money issued or coined, might feel at liberty to accept from his dear friends who have proven their loyalty to the gold standard by liberal contributions in political emergencies and necessities. This is only one of many illustrations—fair, practicable, and most probable—which can be given to demonstrate how the issue of bonds can be easily forced.

Even if the act of June 13, 1898, requiring the coinage of the silver bullion purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, and the retirement of the Treasury notes is not repealed by the House bill, which is an open question, yet it will require some time before its coinage and the subsidiary silver coinage from that bullion will exhaust and retire the Treasury notes. When those Treasury notes are all retired and canceled, we will still have $346,681,016 greenbacks and 483,530,019 standard silver dollars, to be increased by the coinage of the existing bullion to considerably more than five hundred millions, making at least $850,000,000, whose parity and equal value must be maintained by their redemption in gold when asked.

Now, what is the inevitable result of this process of forcing the issue of bonds to get gold to maintain the two gold funds, the gold reserve in the issue and redemption division and the gold fund of not less than fifty millions in the general fund in the Treasury, and to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money issued or coined by the Government? It is the impounding, the accumulation in the Treasury of all the greenbacks, Treasury notes, silver dollars, and silver certificates so redeemed, practically their retirement, and a contraction of the circulating money to their amount. For all obligations, public and private, which must necessarily include all debts, public and private or individual, as well as all appropriations made by Congress to expend or pay certain sums or amounts for certain objects to certain persons, must be performed, paid, discharged, in the gold dollars, the only money of final payment and redemption.

It is no answer to say that "all silver certificates presented for redemption shall be redeemed in accordance with existing law." If this House bill become a law, then it is the existing law. But admit, for argument's sake, that they will be redeemed in silver dollars, then the silver dollars are coined by the Government, and to maintain their parity and equal value with gold they must, according to all gold-standard authorities, be redeemed in gold; and the Secretary is expressly "required to use said reserve fund in maintaining at all times the parity and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the Government. Any time the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary, in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States, he may, at his discretion, exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States."

This is express authority in the very language of the bill which I have quoted. This clinches the fact beyond controversy. For, if he is not expressly required to redeem silver certificates or silver dollars out of the gold reserve, he has the discretion persuasively given to exchange gold coin for them or either of them. Does any sane man suppose for a moment that the Secretary of the Treasury would hesitate a second to exchange gold coin for silver certificates or silver dollars upon the request of the National City Bank of New York or any member of the gold-standard trust, the father and the mother of all the trusts?

Remember also that "the notes and certificates so redeemed or exchanged shall be held in and constitute a part of said redemption fund, and shall not be withdrawn therefrom nor disbursed except in exchange for an equivalent amount of the coin in which said notes were redeemed or exchanged." This can only mean that they can never be withdrawn nor disbursed—paid out—except in exchange for gold coin. Will the Secretary of the Treasury, after having exchanged gold coin for these notes and certificates, take them around—hawk them about—trying to get some "benevolently assimilated" gold-standard friend to exchange his gold coin for them?

Never—no, never! Anathema to him who would suspicion, much less charge, the Secretary of the Treasury with such unbecoming gold-standard conduct. Then, there in the vaults they would remain, retired from circulation, and gold bonds would be issued and sold to replace the gold coin so exchanged for them; and the process would be repeated in the manner of an endless chain until the insatiate desire for United States bonds was fully satisfied.

Enough for the present of this ignis fatuus of a gold standard and this trick-of-the-pen modus operandi of maintaining it!

I go now to the provision in regard to national banks. Section 8 amends section 5159 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to require national banks proposing to commence the banking business to transfer and deliver to the United States Treasurer as security for circulating notes any interest-bearing United States registered bonds to an amount, where the capital is $150,000 or less, not less than one-fourth of the capital, and $50,000 where the capital is in excess of $150,000, with authority for such banks as have on deposit bonds in excess of that amount to reduce their circulation as provided by law. It authorizes existing banks having bonds on deposit, and such banks as hereafter deposit such bonds, to issue circulation to an amount not exceeding the par or face value of such bonds—that is, dollar for dollar of the face value of the bonds.

Section 9 amends section 10 of the act of July 12, 1882, extending the corporate existence of national banks, so as to authorize such banks upon a deposit of bonds, as described in sections 5159 and 5160, to receive from the Comptroller circulating notes not exceeding the face value of their bonds, such notes not to exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock, and repeals sections 5171 and 5176, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Section 10 requires national banks to pay to the United States Treasurer, in addition to the taxes imposed by act of June 13, 1898, a tax semiannually of one-tenth of 1 per cent upon the value of its franchise—that is, upon the aggregate amount of its capital, surplus, and undivided profits—being an annual tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent on capital, surplus, and undivided profits, and repeals sections 5214, 5215, 5216, and 5217, Revised Statutes of the United States, but does not repeal any liability for taxes or penalties already incurred, and imposes penalties for failure to pay the taxes.

Section 11 amends section 5138, Revised Statutes of the United States, so that no national bank shall be organized with less capital than $100,000, but gives the Secretary authority to organize banks with not less than $50,000 capital in places having not over 6,000 population; and with not less than $25,000 in places with not over 2,000 population, and no bank to be organized in a city with a population exceeding 50,000 with a less capital than $200,000.

No one can question the fact that these provisions are in the interest and for an increase of the profits of national banks.

Under existing law a national bank with a capital of $100,000 receives $90,000 in notes and loans same at 6 per cent and receives $5,400 interest, and $4,000 interest from the Government on 4 per cent bonds; receipts $9,400; and pays a tax of $900, 1 per cent, leaving receipts $8,500.

Under this bill the same bank receives $100,000 in notes, loans them at 6 per cent, $6,000 interest, $4,000 interest on bonds; receipts $10,000; and pays a tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent upon its capital, counting it without surplus or undivided profits, being $200, leaving receipts at $9,800, instead of $8,500; clear profit $1,300, equal to 1.3 per cent interest per annum on its capital.

Why shall the national banks be selected as the only ones to have their taxes reduced?

The creation and issue of money is purely and necessarily a function of government—of sovereignty.

Without a government, a sovereignty of the people with authority to legislate, there can be no legal-tender money among the people. Why then shall this great constitutional Government abandon its sovereign right to issue the paper currency for the people and delegate it to corporations—national banking associations? Why shall they alone have the authority to make this Government issue and deliver to them the entire paper currency and be responsible for its final redemption?

Why shall individual citizens holding the same kind of bonds as the banks not have the same?

If this great Government can not maintain coin redemption of its own notes, how can it maintain the coin redemption of the national-bank notes?

Now, Mr. President, I pass to a more interesting question, I hope, to the Senate, and that is to the amendments proposed as a substitute by the Senate Committee on Finance.

Section 1 of the Senate amendments provides that the dollar of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine, as established by section 3511, Revised Statutes of the United States, shall continue to be the standard unit of value; and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard. And United States notes and Treasury notes, when presented to the Treasury for redemption, shall be redeemed in gold coin of such standard. There is no chance to mistake the meaning of this plain language.

It means and can only mean that the gold coins, all of which by weight and fineness and denominations are described in said section 3511, are the only money of final payment and redemption, the only standard unit of value; and that all forms of money issued or coined—mark the words—issued or coined—all forms of paper money or currency, the United States notes or greenbacks, the Treasury notes, and the national-bank notes are issued, and all forms of silver, nickel, and copper money are coined—shall be maintained at a parity of value with the gold standard coins. In plain American words, shall be redeemed in such gold coins whenever demanded.

This is the unquestioned interpretation given by all gold-standard advocates to the word "parity" ever since it crept into the law of July 14, 1890, agreed upon in conference committees. To maintain the parity of value of all forms of money with gold coins, all forms of such money must, at the option of the holder, be redeemed in or received in exchange for gold coins.

To clinch this, and yet at the same time to throw a thin mist of doubt as to the redeemability or exchange of silver dollars in or for gold coins, the greenbacks and Treasury notes shall be redeemed in gold coin; no discretion left—they can be redeemed only in gold coin and in nothing else. The legal tender of the standard silver dollar is taken away—now, let me finish the sentence—is nullified absolutely as to greenbacks and Treasury notes. You can not shake your head now. I will repeat it. The legal tender of the standard silver dollar is taken away, is nullified absolutely as to greenbacks and Treasury notes, and the option of the holders to have them redeemed in silver dollars is taken away, absolutely denied.

You can not shake your head at that. Even the standard silver dollars coined from the same silver bullion purchased with these Treasury notes can not be used in the redemption of such notes, even on demand of the holders of such notes. This section certainly makes glad the heart of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage, who on the 16th and 17th of December, 1897, before the Ways and Means Committee of the House, said:

> Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the objects I have in mind in the series of provisions offered by me are four in number:
> 1. To commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard, remove, so far as possible, doubts and fears on that point, and thus strengthen the credit of United States at home and abroad.
> 2. To strengthen the Treasury in relation to its demand liabilities, in which are included greenbacks, Treasury notes, and the incidental obligation to maintain on a parity, through interchangeability with gold, so far as may be necessary, the present large volume of silver certificates and silver dollars.
> 3. To do this in such a way as not to contract the volume of circulation in the hands of the people.
> 4. To take an initial step toward a system of bank-note issues without the conditional deposit of public bonds as security therefor.

A gold-standard advocate, a Democrat, or mugwump, as you may prefer, taken into the political family of the Republican Executive in the second and most potential position, Secretary of the Treasury, in fraternal recognition of the quasi obligation for the votes and support of the gold-standard Democrats in the Presidential election, has forced upon the Republican party a total abandonment of bimetallism and the adoption of the single standard of gold as the only money of final payment and redemption of all forms of money issued or coined.

This bill is the literal embodiment of the first and second of his four objects, boldly proclaimed in December, 1897. The Senator from Rhode Island, chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, in his speech of January 4 last, in explanation of the bill, referring to the increase of the reserve fund to $150,000,000, said:

> The reason for this is found in the rapidly increasing amount of notes and certificates which, under existing pledges for the maintenance of the parity of value, are directly or indirectly a burden upon the fund.
> On November 1, 1899, the total amount of notes and certificates, including national-bank notes, outstanding was $1,054,000,000, and a reserve fund of $150,000,000 would be 14 per cent of this amount.

This $1,054,000,000 includes $394,976,239 of outstanding silver certificates, the currency certificates, the greenbacks, Treasury notes, and national-bank notes. This he must admit.

And the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, being present, can not deny it. These are his own figures, and these are the only items in the financial statements of the Government that can make the $1,054,000,000.

Now, I want that remembered.

The Senator from Rhode Island further said:

> It is true we do not propose to make all outstanding notes and certificates a direct burden upon the gold reserve. National-bank notes, through their method of redemption in lawful money, are indirectly a burden upon the fund, and so, in a certain sense, are silver certificates and silver dollars.

He further said:

> Both silver dollars and silver certificates are by law receivable for all public dues, and as long as the ordinary receipts of the Government are more than $600,000,000 per annum it is very evident that silver certificates are not likely to go to a discount.

Mark the language:

> The Government itself, in the absence of a positive injunction, would be bound to maintain the value of this form of currency—mark the words—this form of currency—> through the ordinary business channels of exchange for self-protection.

Now, mark the words—

The Government is bound to do it. Therefore, you do not put it in the bill, for the Government is bound to maintain silver certificates, silver dollars, and national-bank notes at a parity with gold by the exchange of gold coin whenever demanded.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. COCKRELL. No other interpretation can be given to it. That is the legitimate interpretation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us see. The Senator further said:

> The committee believe that under these conditions, or, in fact, under any which are likely to arise, there will be no difficulty in maintaining a parity without directing the Secretary to exchange gold coin for silver dollars at the demand of the holder of the silver.

That is to say—mark it—there is no necessity to direct the Secretary to exchange gold in the reserve fund for silver dollars on the demand of the holder of the silver, because the Secretary is already bound to do it and will do it. There is no question on that point.

Mr. ALLISON. Bound to do what?

Mr. COCKRELL. Bound to maintain the parity by that method; and that is the only method by which he can do it.

There is no necessity, because the Government is already bound in self-protection to maintain the parity by exchanging gold for silver, silver certificates, and silver dollars, and redeeming Treasury notes, greenbacks, and national-bank notes in gold dollars.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Missouri put his own construction upon the last part of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is exactly the construction that your Secretary of the Treasury will put upon it, and it is what every gold-standard advocate outside of this Senate Chamber, when the bill shall have become a law, will say it means. There can be no question as to that.

I am trying to deal with exact fairness, and I have quoted the exact language of the Senator from Rhode Island. I say that the Secretary of the Treasury will not hesitate a moment—he has already declared his purpose—whenever silver dollars, silver certificates, greenbacks, Treasury notes, or national-bank notes are presented and gold demanded, to exchange gold for them; and whether you call it redemption or exchange does not make any difference.

Mr. ALDRICH. I know the Senator from Missouri wants to deal fairly with this question.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Do I understand the Senator to say that the Secretary of the Treasury would be bound to pay gold from the reserve in exchange for silver dollars or silver certificates?

Mr. COCKRELL. Under this law?

Mr. ALDRICH. Under this law.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is his interpretation of it.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator can not have read the second section of the bill, which provides that this gold shall be used, and used only, for the redemption of United States notes and United States Treasury notes. It can not be used otherwise.

Mr. COCKRELL. But that does not nullify the provision that you have got to maintain the parity.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have got to take the whole law together.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Secretary of the Treasury can not use the gold reserve for any other purpose except the redemption of United States notes and United States Treasury notes. It is undoubtedly true that the Secretary of the Treasury now and heretofore has, by the use of the clearing house and by other methods, maintained the parity between gold and silver, and so long as they are of equal value the exchange in the ordinary course of business of the general fund in the Treasury affects nobody unfavorably, either the holders of silver or of gold, or the producers of silver or of gold, or any other citizen of the United States who has a general interest in it.

Mr. COCKRELL. We shall see when we go further along. I want to establish the fact—and it is established by the language I have read—that the reason a clause is not put in this bill to require, by explicit words, the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange gold for silver and silver certificates was that he already had that authority by law, and everybody knows he will exercise it.

Mr. CHILTON. And that is the reason for increasing the gold reserve $50,000,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Rhode Island admits that in his speech which I quoted.

Mr. ALDRICH. He can do it indirectly, but not directly.

Mr. COCKRELL. It may be done incidentally; and when it is done incidentally, what is the difference? It is only the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee.

Mr. ALDRICH. The purpose of the Senate committee amendment in increasing the gold reserve was to enable the Secretary of the Treasury, under any circumstances, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined in the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly it was; and to do that he must redeem all the other forms of money just the same. He must redeem them to maintain the parity.

Mr ALDRICH. The Senator uses the word "redeem."

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, then, exchange. I have used the word "exchange" in regard to silver and silver certificates and "redeem" as to the others.

Mr. ALDRICH. "Exchange" is the proper word, but redemption is not the proper word, because the Secretary of the Treasury can exchange any of the forms of money in the general fund of the Treasury at any time when he thinks it is to the public interest, or for the purpose of maintaining the parity.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not make any difference whether you call it redemption or exchange. When a man goes there with silver certificates, Treasury notes, greenbacks, or silver dollars and demands gold, he gets it.

Mr. ALDRICH. It makes all the difference in the world, because redemption is one thing and exchange is another. Money that is redeemed and redeemable by law is not paid out again, unless there is some provision of law, as there is in the case of United States notes, for their reissue. Redemption is the final transaction and the money is retired. An exchange is simply exchanging one form of money in the general fund for another to be used in the course of business for the payment of the debts of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not the way you are legislating in this bill, for you say the greenbacks shall be reissued.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not unless there is some express provision of law.

Mr. COCKRELL. We shall have no controversy about that.

Mr. ALDRICH. We retire the Treasury notes for silver dollars, in accordance with the provisions of law.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that perfectly; but you redeem the greenbacks, to be reissued. It is only the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee, whether you call it redemption or exchange. When a man goes to the Treasury with silver dollars, silver certificates, or Treasury notes and says he wants gold, he gets it, and he does not care whether you call it redemption or exchange.

Continuing, the Senator from Rhode Island said:

> They believe, in fact, that no public interests will be served by the adoption of legislative provision for such an exchange. To make all our silver currency a direct charge upon the gold reserve might imperil at a critical time the sufficiency of the fund. We fear it would serve as an invitation for unfriendly drafts upon the Treasury resources.

Well may you have those fears, and after you have enacted this bill into law you will realize them before many years shall have passed. These quotations settle the question that the Secretary has the right, and will certainly exercise it, without any direct legislative direction, to redeem silver dollars or certificates in gold or exchange gold for them on the demand of the holder of the silver, to maintain the parity of all forms of money with the gold coin.

I now come to section 2, which provides that "to secure the prompt and certain redemption of the United States notes and Treasury notes," the Secretary of the Treasury shall "set apart in the Treasury a reserve fund of $150,000,000 in gold coin" to be "used for such redemption purposes only," and as such notes are redeemed the Secretary shall use them to restore and maintain such reserve fund as follows: First, by exchanging such notes for any gold coin in the general fund of the Treasury; second, by accepting deposits of gold coin at the Treasury or at any subtreasury in exchange for the greenbacks so redeemed; third, by procuring gold coin by the use of said notes in accordance with the provisions of section 3700, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Fourth. If the Secretary be unable to restore and maintain the gold coin in the reserve fund by the three methods named, and the amount of such gold coin reserve fund at any time falls below $100,000,000, then the Secretary shall restore the same to the maximum of $150,000,000 by borrowing money on the credit of the United States; and for the debt thus incurred shall issue and sell coupon or registered bonds, in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing not exceeding 3 per cent interest, payable quarterly, payable at the option of the United States after one year from date, principal and interest payable in gold coin of the present standard value, and to be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States and from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

The gold coin received from the sale of the bonds shall be covered first into the general fund of the Treasury and then exchanged as before provided for an equal amount of the notes so redeemed and held for exchange, and the United States notes exchanged from the reserve fund into the general fund of the Treasury shall be reissued as provided by law. And the gold coin in the reserve fund, together with the redeemed notes held for use as herein provided, shall at no time exceed the maximum sum of $150,000,000.

Suppose, for illustration, the Senate amendments are a law. By such law there are two funds in the Treasury, the gold reserve fund and the general fund.

On January 1, 1900, there was in the Treasury, in round numbers, the sum of $236,000,000 in gold.

To establish the gold reserve fund one hundred and fifty millions are transferred to it from the two hundred and thirty-six millions in the general fund, leaving in the general fund eighty-six millions of gold.

Of the greenbacks, Treasury notes, and currency certificates outstanding there were four hundred and seventeen millions, redeemable only in gold, and termed by the Senator from Rhode Island a direct burden on the reserve.

Of the silver dollars and certificates outstanding there were four hundred and sixty-five millions, no less a burden upon the reserve, because their parity with gold must be maintained and can only be done by exchanging gold coin for them on demand of the holder of the silver, which the Secretary has the clear right to do and would doubtless do.

In addition there were two hundred and forty-two millions of national-bank notes which are indirectly a burden on the reserve, as the United States must redeem them and then look to the bank for their payment. And if redeemed in greenbacks, then the greenbacks would be presented and gold demanded, so that they are no less a burden than the greenbacks. The aggregate of these three burdens on the gold reserve is $1,124,000,000, making the reserve less than 8 per cent of the burdens or liabilities.

More bonds are wanted by the gold aristocracy, and they raid the Treasury and present greenbacks and Treasury notes to the amount of sixty millions. The reserve is reduced to ninety millions and sixty millions are exchanged from the general fund to the reserve for the redeemed notes, and only twenty-six millions are left in the general fund. Another raid of sixty millions is made and the reserve reduced to ninety millions, and the twenty-six millions of gold in the general fund is transferred to it, making it one hundred and sixteen millions, and no gold in the general fund.

Another raid of thirty millions reduces the gold reserve to eighty-six millions, fourteen millions below the minimum, and no gold in the general fund. And now sixty-four millions of gold must be secured to restore the reserve fund to one hundred and fifty millions, in one of the four manners named in the bill. The first—exchanging gold coin in the general fund for the redeemed notes—has been exhausted, and there is no gold in the general Treasury. And one hundred and fifty millions of greenbacks and Treasury notes are held in the Treasury, excepting such greenbacks as may have been reissued in defraying the expenditures of the Government.

The second is the voluntary deposit of gold coin by its holders in exchange for the greenbacks. This is impracticable, because it is the holders of the greenbacks, etc., who have demanded gold for them, and when such a process of presenting greenbacks and other liabilities for redemption in gold has been going on, no holders of gold will make such exchange.

The third—and I desire to call the special attention of the Senate to the third process—is to procure gold coin by the use of said notes, as authorized in section 3700, Revised Statutes of the United States. I will read this section:

SEC. 3700. The Secretary of the Treasury may purchase coin with any of the bonds or notes of the United States, authorized by law, at such rates and upon such terms as he may deem most advantageous to the public interests.

This law was enacted March 17, 1862, in war times and extremities, and the gold standard is bringing us back to the enactment of laws such as were necessary in times of war and extremity, because it is producing a monetary war and monetary extremity more disastrous to the country and the world than the devastations of war.

Is it possible that a Republican Administration, a Republican House, Senate, and Executive, will, in order to maintain this phantom of a gold standard and the parity of the full legal-tender United States notes, Treasury notes, standard silver dollars and certificates with gold coin, not only sanction but directly and specifically authorize their gold-standard Secretary to purchase the precious gold coin with the legal-tender United States notes at such rates and upon such terms as he may deem most advantageous—that is, to sell at public auction, or in the open market, or at private sale United States greenbacks at such rates or prices and upon such terms as he may deem most advantageous to the public interests—that is, the gold standard and its maintenance.

As these notes bear no interest, and if they can not be sold for gold, then bonds bearing interest must be sold, no holder of gold will buy them. He will wait for the bonds. Then the Secretary having failed by the three methods named to restore the gold reserve, it becomes his duty to restore the reserve to its maximum of one hundred and fifty millions by borrowing money on the credit of the United States, and for the debt thus incurred to issue and sell United States 3 per cent bonds, as described in said section, for gold coin at such rates or prices as he may deem best—at par, above par, or below par—and to such an amount as will restore the reserve to its maximum.

When this has been done, and the greenbacks, silver certificates and dollars impounded in the Treasury have been reissued and paid out for appropriations made by Congress for the support of the Government and other objects, and more bonds are wanted, they can all be again presented, gold demanded, and the reserve exhausted and bonds again issued, and the endless chain will continue.

It can be and it will be worked as I have indicated, and just as has been done in past years.

The gold-standard trust, composed of the holders of the accumulated wealth of Europe and the United States, and having in their control and power most of the rich gold mines of the world and the existing stock of gold and many billions of the debts and obligations of the governments, states, municipalities, corporations, and individuals of the whole world, have the power under this proposed law to do just as I have pointed out; and not only have they such power, but it is also to their pecuniary interest and profit to do so.

When they have forced the issue of a few hundred millions of dollars in bonds, and are keeping the endless chain in operation, the cry will be raised, "The credit of the Government at home and abroad must be maintained," and can only be done by canceling and destroying the greenbacks and making the silver dollars a subsidiary coin, legal tender for a small sum, and giving to the banks the absolute control of all the paper currency of the country. There is what your legislation leads to.

Section 3 requires the Secretary, as fast as standard silver dollars are coined under the acts of July 14, 1890, and June 13, 1898, from the bullion now in the Treasury, to retire and cancel an equal amount of the Treasury notes issued in its purchase whenever they come into the Treasury and to issue silver certificates for such dollars—a very good provision. Under the act of June 13, 1898, the Secretary can coin it all as rapidly as the coinage capacity of the mints can issue the dollars.

He can coin it if he will in a very short time. He is required to coin not less than a fixed sum, but there is no maximum sum prescribed over which he shall not coin. If he chooses, he can coin that bullion rapidly and substitute silver and silver certificates for Treasury notes and wipe the Treasury notes out of existence.

Section 4 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to receive deposits of gold coin in sums not less than $20 and to issue gold certificates therefor not less than $20, and to hold the coin for the payment of such certificates only; such certificates to be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received to be reissued. The authority to issue such certificates shall be suspended whenever and so long as the gold coin in the reserve fund falls and remains below $100,000,000.

One-fourth of such certificates at least shall be in denominations of $50 or less.

The Secretary may issue such certificates in denominations of $10,000, payable to order.

Section 5193, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing the Secretary to issue certificates in denominations not less than $5,000 upon deposit in sums not less than $10,000 of United States notes by national banks, is repealed.

These gold certificates of large denominations, of not less than $10,000, as a matter of course can only be used in the clearing houses and in large banks. So far as the gold represented by them is concerned, it is practically out of circulation among the people transacting the business of the country. It is simply in the clearing houses and in the large banks, and is transferred by check or draft, but it is not part of the money of our country—the money of the people.

Section 5 requires all United States notes and Treasury notes to be in denominations not less than $10 and all silver certificates in $10 and less.

The result of this will be that all the silver will be represented by certificates, because the people always prefer the certificates to the silver dollar—that is, the great bulk of them do—and it is an advantage to the Government and to the people to have silver certificates circulating instead of silver dollars, for if the silver dollar is lost it is gone, but if the silver certificate is lost or destroyed, the silver dollar representing it is still in the Treasury and belongs to the whole people, to the country. What is the loss to the individual is the gain to the mass.

Now, you make gold the only money of final payment and redemption, which will cause great difficulty in many places in the country, where an extortionate creditor, for instance, demands gold of his debtor, and only gold. The great bulk of the money of the people will be the small notes. There will be no place where anyone will be bound to exchange gold for them, because the exchange can only be compulsory at the Treasury of the United States or at a subtreasury of the United States, for no national bank will be compelled to exchange them. The banks will not be compelled, in the first instance, even to redeem their own notes in gold; they can redeem them, first, in greenbacks, and then, as a matter of course, the greenbacks go to the Treasury.

That is the way the bank notes are maintained. They depend for their existence, validity, and circulation upon the redeemability by the United States, just as the greenbacks are redeemable; and the Government is just as directly bound for their redemption as it is bound for the redemption of the greenbacks. For the redemption of the greenbacks the Government has the entire population and property of the United States to call upon by taxation, and for the redemption of the national-bank notes we only have the bonds which they have deposited with us.

Section 6 authorizes the Secretary to receive any or all the $95,009,700 of bonds bearing 5 per cent interest, payable February 1, 1904, and the $545,345,350 4 per cent bonds, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after July 1, 1907, and the $198,791,440 3 per cent Spanish-war bonds, redeemable after ten years at option of the United States and payable twenty years from August 1, 1908, aggregating over $839,000,000, and to issue in exchange therefor an equal amount of United States coupon or registered bonds, in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing 2 per cent interest, payable quarterly, to be redeemable or payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from date, principal and interest payable in gold coin of present standard, to be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

The outstanding bonds to be received in exchange at a valuation not greater than their present worth, to yield an income of 2½ per centum per annum, and the Secretary to pay to the holders of such outstanding bonds, received for such exchange, a sum not greater than the difference between their present worth, computed as above stated, and their par value; such payments to be on account of sinking fund, the 2 per cent bonds to be issued at not less than par, numbered consecutively in order of issue, and when payable, the last numbers issued shall be first paid; and whenever any outstanding bonds are called for payment, interest thereon shall cease three months after such call.

Section 7 authorizes all national banks, existing and hereafter to be organized, to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes equal to the par value of the bonds deposited, and if the market value of the bonds fall below the par value of the circulating notes the Comptroller can require additional deposits of bonds or of lawful money.

No national-bank notes hereafter are to be less than $10, and the total amount of such notes shall at no time exceed the amount of capital stock actually paid in.

Section 8 requires every national bank having on deposit United States 2 per cent bonds to secure circulating notes to pay a tax of one-half of 1 per cent annually, or one-fourth of 1 per cent semiannually, upon the average amount of its circulating notes in lieu of the existing taxes of 1 per cent annually, one-half of 1 per cent payable semiannually, imposed by section 5214, Revised Statutes United States.

I ask the Senator from Iowa if I am not correct in this respect? This would leave all national banks having other than 2 per cent bonds on deposit for circulating notes still subject to a tax of 1 per cent per annum on average amount of circulating notes, thus giving the benefit of one-half of 1 per cent to the banks having 2 per cent bonds on deposit for circulating notes, and holding out an inducement to that amount to exchange their bonds for 2 per cent bonds.

The Senate amendments introduce an entirely new measure—the refunding of the United States bonds, aggregating over $839,000,000, maturing February 1, 1904, July 1, 1907, and August 1, 1908, into thirty-year bonds, with reduced rates of interest, to mature in 1930, and remainder of our United States bonds not maturing till February 1, 1925, being $162,315,400, so that none of them can be paid prior to 1925 and the eight hundred and thirty-nine millions not till 1930. This is a manifest departure from the traditional policy of our Government.

My recollection is that but once in the whole history of our country has the United States Government ever issued any bond obligations running longer than thirty years. Here is a measure to issue $839,000,000 of bonds, it is true bearing a low rate of interest, but running for thirty years, and then the only interest-bearing bonds we would have outstanding would be a hundred and sixty-two millions of bonds not maturing until 1925 and one hundred and ninety-eight millions Spanish war bonds payable at option after ten years from date.

So when this bill becomes a law in the form that is proposed by the Senate committee, we will not have any indebtedness which can be reached or paid by the people of the United States except a little sum of money, $25,000,000, I believe, of bonds outstanding, which matured in 1891, and which are only drawing 2 per cent. They are payable at the option of the Treasury of the United States. All the indebtedness of the Government then would be deferred, a hundred and sixty-two million dollars payable in 1925 and one hundred and ninety-eight millions ten years after their date at our option and the remaining $839,000,000 in 1930, and the people will have no method of exchanging those bonds. They are not payable at the option of the Government. Here is a movement, the first initial movement, for the perpetuation of the national debt of the United States in imitation of the debt of Great Britain, in imitation of the English consols.

Now, is it to the interest of the people of the United States that this great nation shall be bound down for ages and ages to come by interest-bearing obligations which the people are abundantly able and will be able and will be anxious to extinguish and wipe out? It weakens this Government to that extent, because freedom from debt among the nations of the world is the greatest strength any nation can possess. It is power, it is prestige, and it has its influence upon every other nation; and yet we are burdened for the next thirty years with obligations to the extent of over a billion dollars of interest-bearing bonds, which we can not pay, no difference what our surplus revenues may be.

We have gone through that process, Mr. President. We have paid out millions upon millions of dollars—I have forgotten the exact amount—in premiums to the holders of our bonds bought with greenbacks at 50 cents on the dollar, made by law redeemable only in gold, and then we have paid them dollar for dollar in gold, after having paid 4 or 5 or 6 per cent interest upon them, and have given them a premium of from 10 to 15 per cent upon the value of the bonds for the privilege of exchanging them and stopping the interest.

This will be the only process we can ever resort to in regard to these bonds until they become due, and yet that load has to be carried. We have to stand among the nations of the world with a burden of a billion dollars of national interest-bearing debt. Why is this, I ask? Is it done simply to perpetuate the single gold standard and transfer to the national banks of the United States the absolute, unqualified right and power to issue and control the entire paper currency of the United States; to make the volume of money whatever it is to their interest to have it, and to reduce it to whatever amount it is to their interest to reduce it?

You bind the people of the United States in bondage to the chariot wheels of the national banks for all time to come. You surrender the sovereign right of the United States to issue paper currency. You do not transfer it to the banks, but you organize the banks, and then you issue the bank notes, showing that the issue of paper currency is an act of sovereignty, because you issue the notes and kindly hand them over to the national banks, dollar for dollar for every dollar of bonds deposited, and then you pay interest upon the bonds and allow them to loan the money that you give them, that you create, that you issue by law, at the highest rate of interest which they can compel the people of the United States to pay them. Where is the justice, where is the humanity, where is the Christianity in any such a process as this? You can find no justification for it; you can find no extenuation for it in anything written by mortal or divine authority.

BRIDGE ACROSS LUMBER RIVER, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate House bill 4000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill indicated by the Senator from North Carolina.

The bill (H. R. 4000) to authorize the Southeastern Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Lumber River within the boundary lines of Robeson County, N. C., was read the first time by its title and the second time at length.

Mr. BUTLER. A similar bill passed the Senate Tuesday. I ask that the vote by which the Senate bill on the subject was passed be reconsidered and that the bill be indefinitely postponed and the House bill be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 1617) to authorize the Southeastern Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Lumber River within the boundary lines of Robeson County, N. C., was passed February 6, and that the bill be indefinitely postponed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the House bill may be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4000) to authorize the Southeastern Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Lumber River within the boundary lines of Robeson County, N. C.?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS FISHING CREEK, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 2925) to authorize Frank Hitch to construct and maintain a bridge across Fishing Creek within the boundary lines of Edgecombe County, N. C., may be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the bill been reported?

Mr. BUTLER. It was reported yesterday by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CUBAN VESSELS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on the 17th of last month the Senate passed the bill (S. 734) relating to Cuban vessels, and it went to the House and the House amended it. The bill and amendment came here and went to the Committee on Commerce. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report the bill back, with the recommendation that the House amendment be concurred in. As this is a somewhat urgent matter, I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the House of Representatives will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The House of Representatives propose to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon application and satisfactory evidence, tonnage taxes and light dues which have been imposed on vessels owned by citizens of Cuba entering ports of the United States since April 11, 1899, which have been in excess of the tonnage taxes prescribed by section 11 of the act of June 19, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives?

The amendment was concurred in.

LANDS ON OAHU ISLAND, HAWAII.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Some days ago I asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 76) withdrawing certain lands on the island of Oahu, Hawaii, from the public domain, which I then reported from the Committee on Public Lands. I see that both of the Senators who had some questions about it on that day are present to-day, and I again ask for its present consideration. I deem it a matter of sufficient importance to make the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution indicated by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution has heretofore been read.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator to explain in a word, if he can, what the object of the bill is?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is simply this: There is a tract of probably a hundred and twenty thousand square feet of land in the suburbs of Honolulu which has been for many years dedicated to the purposes of a royal mausoleum. It has upon it buildings built by the Hawaiian government, and the people there are very solicitous lest it shall become a part of the public domain of the United States and either be divided up or let out for show purposes. It may be a mere sentiment on their part, but they are very solicitous about it, and on my visit to the island I was asked to take up the matter—and I do so in this manner—to withdraw it from the public domain.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Wisconsin asked one of the questions I wanted to ask. There is another he did not ask, and it is one which has not yet been answered. There are about 120,000 square feet. Can the Senator tell us whether it is all occupied or all in use? That is a considerable tract of ground for the royal family alone to have for burial purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is not so very large when you come to consider the dimensions. I think perhaps it is 250 feet on the street, extending backward so as to contain in all about 120,000 feet. There are upon that ground one or two buildings, one a building for the caretaker of the grounds, the other a mausoleum, a Gothic building of stone, and one or two subterranean vaults. The land is all needed for the purpose for which it has been reserved, and is all properly cared for and set out in walks, with trees, etc.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the depth of it?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator's arithmetic will tell him. I should say it is 250 feet in front. The dimensions are all given in the joint resolution. That would make it——

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not hear the joint resolution read. In fact, it has not been read to-day.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There are 120,000 square feet, and I think it is not more than 250 feet in front, extending back——

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there anything more than a reasonable space around the mausoleum and the buildings?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think it is only a reasonable space.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to inquire what was the condition of the title before the annexation of the islands by Congress?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It was public land.

Mr. FORAKER. Was not this a part of the Crown land?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; it was a part of the public land.

Mr. FORAKER. It was part of the land set aside originally for the government.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. For the government.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand that originally the public domain was divided into three classes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Three classes—the government one-third, the Crown one-third, and individuals one-third.

Mr. FORAKER. One-third for the government, one-third for the Crown, and one-third for the people.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. This belonged to the public lands, and was taken over by our Government the same as the Crown lands.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is one matter which troubles me, and probably the Senator from Wyoming can readily explain it. This relates to a mausoleum for the royal family of Hawaii, and the bill provides that the land "shall * * * be forever reserved for the purpose to which the said lands have been heretofore dedicated." I presume we are not going to have a royal family of Hawaii continued in that possession which now belongs to the United States?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from New Hampshire would not be unwilling to allow those who are of the royal family to be buried where their kindred are buried?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly not; but they would hardly want 25 or 30 acres for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, there are probably not over 5 or 6 acres.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not figured it out.

Mr. TELLER. There are about 2½ acres.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why make a dedication of it now? I move to strike out all that part of the bill which dedicates it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is no part at all that dedicates it. The land is simply withdrawn from the public domain, so that a constituent of the Senator from Missouri or a constituent of mine from Wyoming can not go in and file on it for a homestead whenever the public-land laws are extended over it.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming if this land was not dedicated by the existing government for that purpose?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Nothing has ever been done by the existing government in regard to it. I will say to the Senator that it has been kept up by private enterprise.

Mr. TELLER. There are less than 2½ acres, as I understand from the statement; somewhere in that neighborhood.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from New Hampshire is figuring it out.

Mr. TELLER. It is less than 3 acres, anyway.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is very small, but it is one of those matters of sentiment which I think ought to prevail.

Mr. TELLER. There are less than 3 acres.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to reserving the land from sale, but I object to dedicating it and keeping a guard at the tomb.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The bill does not do that.

Mr. TELLER. Does this bill do any more than allow the President to withdraw the land?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The bill simply withdraws the land from public sale under the land laws.

Mr. SPOONER. It does provide for withdrawing the land forever.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORAKER. Let the joint resolution be reported.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the joint resolution.

Mr. FORAKER. Pass over the description.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that this description is taken from the official records.

Mr. FORAKER. We assume that it is right.

The Secretary read as follows:

Area, 119,610 square feet, be withdrawn from sale, lease, or other disposition under the public-land laws of the United States, and that said lands shall, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may from time to time prescribe, be forever reserved for the purpose to which the said lands have been heretofore dedicated and for which they have been heretofore used.

Mr. FORAKER. Is it sufficient to answer the purpose of the Senator to simply withdraw the land from sale or lease?

Mr. CULLOM. Strike out the word "forever."

Mr. COCKRELL. In pursuance of that suggestion, I move to strike out, in line 15, all after the words "United States;" so that the land will be "withdrawn from sale, lease, or other disposition under the public-land laws of the United States."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not think the portion proposed to be stricken out is material. I am satisfied with that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 15 it is proposed to strike out:

And that said lands shall, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may from time to time prescribe, be forever reserved for the purpose to which the said lands have been heretofore dedicated and for which they have been heretofore used.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I have observed that frequently notices are given of the time when Senators desire to speak upon the pending bill. I wish to give notice that on Saturday, if an opportunity occurs, I shall be very glad to address the Senate. I understand the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] has already given public notice of his intention to speak on that day, and I do not wish to interfere with him; but after he shall have finished, if no other Senator wants the floor at that time, I shall be glad to take it.

Mr. TALIAFERRO rose.

Mr. ALDRICH. If there is no other Senator ready to proceed with the discussion of the bill at the present time, I ask that it may be laid aside temporarily in order that we may go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say a word. There are several Senators who have expressed their intention to speak upon this bill who have not given any notice, and with the notices already given if they are not ready to speak to-morrow they will very likely be cut out, unless they come in under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from Arkansas know of any Senator on the other side who wants to speak on the bill to-morrow?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have not been notified of anyone who will be ready to go on to-morrow.

Mr. TELLER. If there is anyone ready, he can go on to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will not press the proposition to proceed with the Calendar until the Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO] has had an opportunity to present to the Senate a request for unanimous consent. He was on the floor at the time.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not intend to cut off the Senator from Florida, but simply desired to withdraw the bill from consideration to allow other matters to be considered that the Senate might see fit to decide upon.

JAMES J. HOLLAND.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2943) granting an increase of pension to James J. Holland.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of James J. Holland, late of Company E, Seventy-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that House bill No. 1, the financial bill, be temporarily laid aside, and that the Calendar be proceeded with.

Mr. ALDRICH. Under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

LOG ENTRY OF COLLISIONS.

The bill (S. 731) to amend section 4290 of the Revised Statutes, relating to log entry of collisions, was announced as next in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 4290 of the Revised Statutes by adding the following:

Twelfth. In every case of collision in which it is practicable so to do, the master shall, immediately after the occurrence, cause a statement thereof, and of the circumstances under which the same occurred, to be entered in the official log book. Such entry shall be made in the manner prescribed in section 4291, and failure to make such entry shall subject the offender to the penalties prescribed by section 4292.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY BIEDERBICK AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 1938) to place Henry Biederbick, Julius R. Frederick, Francis Long, and Maurice Connell on the retired list of enlisted men of the Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President to cause Henry Biederbick, Julius R. Frederick, Francis Long, and Maurice Connell, survivors of the Lady Franklin Bay expedition, to be enlisted as first-class sergeants of the Signal Corps of the Army and to place them on the retired list of the Army, with the pay and allowances, from and after the passage of this act, of first-class sergeants of the Signal Corps who have been retired after continuous active service of fifteen years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHARD KING.

The bill (S. 328) for the relief of Richard King was announced as next in order on the Calendar, and the Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill from the Senator who reported it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator from Wisconsin will listen to me for a moment I can explain it. There is a written report here. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session of Congress, after having passed the scrutiny of the Committee on Military Affairs. They reported the bill favorably and it was passed, but it failed of consideration in the other House for some reason or other. The bill was reintroduced at the present session of Congress and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and again favorably reported from that committee.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I can detail briefly what the report is, or the Senator can have it read. It is a matter upon which the War Department has passed favorably.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator briefly detail the circumstances.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will briefly detail them.

A citizen of Wyoming, one fine summer day, was feeding his sheep, all the property he had, on a hillside upon the trail between Rawlins, in Wyoming, and Fort Du Chesne, Utah. A troop of United States cavalry were passing along the route and certain hunters had been detailed to get provisions. This man King, who comes from my own town, was, as I said, seated upon the hillside. The first thing he knew he heard the report of a Winchester, and at the same moment felt the ball, which passed entirely through him. The two soldiers who were hunting came up and said to him that they mistook him for an antelope and shot him. They went on and joined their command, promising to send back help. Being fearful of the consequences of their action, they made no report at the time when they rejoined the column, and I think it was the next day before either of them made any report, when the surgeon was sent back.

In the meantime this man had managed by one way and another to crawl to his camp, where his wife was, and he was laid up for many months in the hospital, and incurred an expenditure of over $600 for medical attendance. His sheep were scattered, all the property that he had on earth was gone, and all his misfortunes were caused through the fault and neglect of a soldier of the United States Army.

This bill is in line with many other appropriations which have been made. The Senator will remember one case from his own State.

Mr. SPOONER. What case was that?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; it was in Minnesota, at Fort Snelling, where a man was injured by the carelessness and the bad aim of a soldier who was firing at a target, the citizen coming within range of his shot. There have been a number of precedents for this relief, and I hope the Senator will not raise any objection to the bill, in view of the circumstances of the case, and it having already once passed the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. The fact that a bill has already once passed the Senate is not by any means conclusive evidence that it ought ever to have passed or that it ought to be passed now.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But it shows that it has been considered here.

Mr. SPOONER. I had the honor and the very great labor for a number of years to act as chairman of the Committee on Claims, and during those years it was the settled policy of the Senate and the House of Representatives not to pass any bill which admitted liability upon the part of the United States for injuries resulting from the wanton or negligent acts of servants of the United States, whether in the Army, in the Navy, or in any other department of the public service.

And, Mr. President, while the case stated by the Senator from Wyoming is one which of course appeals to the sympathies of any right-minded man, it is one which in my judgment ought not to be adopted as a precedent by Congress. There have occurred thousands of such cases—yes, tens of thousands of such cases—in the history of the Government. They will occur again, because all the administration of the Government must be carried forward by agents. The Government can only act through the instrumentality of agents; and if the Government of the United States is to be held liable for injuries resulting from the carelessness or the negligence of its agents, we will simply bankrupt the Treasury of the United States. These soldiers, according to the statement of the Senator, were not at the time of this accident in the discharge of public duty. They were hunting.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Wisconsin certainly misunderstood my statement. It was the transfer of a column of United States troops from one post to another, and these men were detailed to procure meat for the command.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, that makes no difference, although I misunderstood the Senator. The Senator himself states that the injury for which his constituent seeks compensation was the result of negligence upon the part of a soldier.

I remember a case, one of the most heartrending I ever heard of in my life, that was pressed by the Senators from New Hampshire, and which, out of regard for the public interest, the Committee on Claims felt obliged to report adversely. There was a company of colored artillerymen, as I remember it, at Portsmouth Harbor in the offing of an island upon which there were blackberries. The poorer class of people used to go from Portsmouth to that island—men, women, and children—to gather berries. The soldiers one day, shooting at a target, shot and exploded shell after shell toward that island. It was in broad daylight. They knew, or had every reason to suppose, that there were people upon that island. A woman and her children, frightened by the explosion, sought the little boat which took them over there and was to bring them back, and after they had started from the shore a shell fired by this company exploded and destroyed the boat, killed one of the children, injured the woman and made her insane, and wrought ruin and havoc in the family.

This was an application by the husband for damages. It was a wanton act upon the part of the soldiers, and the committee felt obliged, with all the sympathy that men could feel in such a case, to decline to recommend the bill for favorable action by the Houses of Congress.

Agents of the Government, soldiers, are negligent somewhere every day. Agents of the Government who work upon the rivers and harbors of the United States are negligent. The drivers of mail wagons are negligent. There is absolutely no limit to claims of this kind if the doors of the Treasury are once opened.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I will state that during my service in the other House I pressed with great pertinacity this New Hampshire case, but I found after a good deal of experience and labor that the policy of the Government was not to pay claims of this character. It was abandoned and has not been renewed. It was as the Senator from Wisconsin states. I was surprised, I think in the last Congress, when this case was mentioned, to find his familiarity with it. It was a case of extreme suffering and sorrow. The case now under consideration does not at all compare with it in magnitude, and yet it was not allowed, and I do not suppose it ever will be presented to Congress again.

Mr. SPOONER. There were during the war thousands, tens of thousands, of cases—cases which occurred to soldiers who were located in the North—of injuries by negligence, sometimes wanton injury. A great many of such claims came to the committee. I repeat, Mr. President, notwithstanding the case is one which appeals to the sympathy of Senators, if we open this door, if we make a precedent of this kind, there will be absolutely no limit to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's five minutes have expired. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPOONER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Without prejudice?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without prejudice. The next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. SPOONER subsequently said: I did not intend by the objection which I made to the consideration of the bill for the relief of the citizen of Wyoming to have it lose its place on the Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that it may retain its place on the Calendar, notwithstanding my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announced that it would retain its place without prejudice.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not hear the announcement of the Chair. All right.

BENJAMIN W. LORING.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I ask consent to call up at this time Senate bill 281, which was passed over yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill which, in his absence yesterday, was passed over without prejudice.

Mr. PLATT of New York. It is the bill (S. 281) to restore Benjamin W. Loring to the Revenue-Cutter Service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the President to commission First Lieut. Benjamin W. Loring, now on the permanent waiting orders list of the United States Revenue-Cutter Service, a captain on that list with the pay of that grade provided by law for officers on permanent waiting orders.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREE HOMES ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 17) to provide free homes on the public lands for actual and bona fide settlers, and reserve the public lands for that purpose.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, and it goes over without prejudice.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

The bill (S. 728) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. From the indications at the desk it seems to me that that is a bill rather too important to be passed under the five-minute rule. I do not know but that it is a meritorious bill. I hope it will be passed over without losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

PROOF IN PENSION CASES.

The bill (S. 1881) defining and regulating proof in certain pension cases was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that upon the consideration of any application for a pension under any law of the United States the fact that the applicant was accepted and mustered into the military or naval service of the United States shall be taken and held as prima facie proof that such applicant was of sound body and mind at the time he was so accepted and mustered.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNA M. COLMAN.

The bill (S. 447) to permit Anna M. Colman, a widow, to prosecute a claim, was read.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope some Senator will explain the nature of that case.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. STEWART January 15, 1900, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 447) to permit Anna M. Colman, a widow, to prosecute a claim, have duly considered the same and submit the following report:

A similar bill was favorably reported from this committee in the Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, and Fifty-fifth Congresses, and passed the Senate in each Congress, and S. 253, Fifty-fifth Congress, was favorably reported in the House (House Report 204, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session).

A similar bill, presented in the House (H. R. 10052, Fifty-second Congress, second session), was favorably reported from the Committee on War Claims by Mr. Cobb.

The case is set forth in said report, which your committee adopt as a part of this report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The report made by Mr. Cobb in the last Congress is as follows:

"The Committee on War Claims, having had under consideration the bill (No. 10052) entitled 'An act to permit Mrs. Ann M. Colman, widow, to prosecute a claim,' respectfully report that they find that Charles D. Colman, the husband of claimant, was appointed by the President, June, 1863, provost-marshal for the first district of Missouri; that Colman had theretofore been a lawyer, enjoying a lucrative practice, in St. Louis; that on February 15, 1865, he had on deposit the sum of $30,049 in money and Government bonds; that one James H. Baker, acting as provost-marshal-general, seized said money and bonds and turned over the same to Capt. John Hamilton, mustering and disbursing officer, and a fine of $700 was also assessed against him by a court-martial, which he paid to L. C. Easton, chief quartermaster of the Department of Missouri.

"The seizure and conversion of this money and securities, as well as the fine, Colman claimed was illegal and an act of mere arbitrary power. While still asserting his claim to have it refunded to him, he died, bequeathing by his will this claim to his widow, the claimant. The question of the legality of the seizure and of the fine is one, in the opinion of the committee, which this claimant should be permitted the right to have investigated and passed upon by a court of competent jurisdiction. The facts, as presented to the committee, seem to entitle her to a full and fair hearing on the merits upon legal proof, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass."

Mr. ALDRICH. I think that bill had better go over. It seems to me that it establishes a dangerous precedent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over without prejudice.

JOHN L. SMITHMEYER AND PAUL J. PELZ.

The bill (S. 186) for the relief of John L. Smithmeyer and Paul J. Pelz was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that bill may go over.

Mr. STEWART. Without prejudice?
Mr. ALLISON. Without prejudice.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over, retaining its place.

ROAD TO NATIONAL CEMETERY AT DOVER, TENN.

The bill (S. 79) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Dover, Tenn., was read.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to have some explanation of the bill. I did not know that it was the policy of the Government of the United States to build roads 11 miles long in any State or in any part of the United States. It seems to me to be a little stretch of the authority of the Government. I should be glad to hear the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] who reported the bill as to the necessity for it.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Tennessee is not here.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then the bill had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over without prejudice.

ELIAS B. BELL.

The bill (S. 148) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Elias B. Bell was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to remove the charge of desertion now borne on the records of the War Department against the name of Elias B. Bell, formerly a member of Company E, Fourth Regiment West Virginia Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS.

The bill (S. 233) to amend the immigration laws of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. RAWLINS. I think that bill had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

SOLDIERS' HOME AT CHARLESTON, S. C.

The bill (S. 1018) to establish a branch home of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Castle Pinckney, in Charleston Harbor, South Carolina, or some other eligible site in or near that city, for the use of disabled officers and enlisted men of the Volunteer Army and Navy of the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. The senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] desires to be present when that bill is considered, and I ask that it may be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

LOUISA M. WRIGHT.

The bill (S. 1353) granting an increase of pension to Louisa M. Wright was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that bill be passed over temporarily. The senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], who is interested in it, is not in the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

EUNICE TRIPLER.

The bill (S. 147) for the relief of Eunice Tripler, widow of Charles S. Tripler, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Mrs. Eunice Tripler, widow of Surg. Charles S. Tripler, United States Army, $3,000, for services by Charles S. Tripler in his lifetime, in preparing, superintending, and directing the publication of a manual for the medical officers of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCIS W. SEELEY.

The bill (S. 1387) to place Francis W. Seeley on the retired list of the Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President of the United States to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Francis W. Seeley, late a captain in the Fourth Regiment United States Artillery, a captain of artillery in the Army, and to place him on the retired list with that rank and pay, the retired list being thereby increased in number to that extent; but from and after his appointment under the provisions of this act no pension shall be paid him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BVT. COL. THOMAS P. O'REILLY.

The bill (S. 1394) for the relief of Bvt. Col. Thomas P. O'Reilly was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President of the United States to appoint Thomas P. O'Reilly, late second lieutenant in the Twenty-second Infantry of the Army, a second lieutenant in the Army, and to place him upon the retired list of the Army in his late grade, the retired list being thereby increased in number to that extent.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIEUT. FIDELIO S. CARTER.

The joint resolution (S. R. 43) granting a life-saving medal of the first class to Lieut. Fidelio S. Carter, of the United States Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to bestow upon Lieut. Fidelio S. Carter, of the United States Navy, a life-saving medal of the first class in recognition of his services in saving the lives of two persons from drowning off Fort Monroe, Va., on the evening of April 24, 1898.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

The bill (S. 1783) to provide for the construction of an interoceanic canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

SARAH K. M'LEAN.

The bill (S. 1386) for the relief of Sarah K. McLean was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officers to settle and adjust to Sarah K. McLean, widow of the late Lieut. Col. Nathaniel H. McLean, all back pay and emoluments that would have been due and payable to Nathaniel H. McLean as a major from July 23, 1864, to the date of his reinstatement, March 3, 1875, and appropriates the amount found due by said adjustment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OWNERS OF THE SCHOONER BERGEN.

The bill (S. 1243) for the relief of the owner or owners of the schooner Bergen was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the claim of the legal owner or owners of the schooner Bergen, of New York, Benjamin H. Moss, master, of her cargo, freight, tow, and personal effects, alleged to have been sunk by collision with the U. S. S. Periwinkle, at the mouth of the Potomac River, on or about the 18th day of January, 1865, to be referred to the Court of Claims, to hear and determine the same to judgment, with the right of appeal as in other cases; but no suit shall be brought under the provisions of this act after six months from the date of its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEVI STOLTZ.

The bill (S. 879) for the relief of Levi Stoltz was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I object to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under objection.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will not object to that bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall have to object. It involves a question which can not be disposed of under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill involves the question of the removal of the force of the statute of limitations in regard to certain revenue cases, and I think it can not be disposed of under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FORAKER. The bill has been several times passed. It is an absolutely just claim, and it involves only a very small amount, about $1,100.

Mr. ALDRICH. It may involve many hundreds of millions of dollars when the question of removing the statute of limitations is concerned.

Mr. FORAKER. That may be.

Mr. ALDRICH. And it will be a very dangerous precedent, I will say to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

Mr. ALDRICH. Without prejudice.

Mr. FORAKER. It does not lose its place on the Calendar, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not.

GLOBE WORKS, OF BOSTON, MASS.

The bill (S. 1934) for the relief of the Globe Works, of Boston, Mass., was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask that for a few moments the bill be allowed to lie over. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] reported a bill for the Globe Works this morning, and the Chair has sent for that bill to see whether it is the same.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the bill had better go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not mean to help it in that direction. The bill will go over.

OWNERS OF THE BRITISH SHIP FOSCOLIA.

The bill (S. 189) for the relief of the owners of the British ship Foscolia and cargo was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to inquire if the report shows that that bill has been referred to any of the Departments of the Government for examination and recommendation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report from the Navy Department.

Mr. SPOONER. Recommending the passage of the bill?

Mr. PERKINS. There is a recommendation for favorable action on the bill, which will be found on page 2 of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Department has recommended it.

Mr. CULLOM. Are there any indications of the cost of this ship, cargo, etc.?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report accompanying the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I think if there are any reports connected with such bills for the settlement of large claims, they ought to be read, so that we may hear the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. WARREN January 17, 1900, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 189) for the relief of the owners of the British ship Foscolia and cargo, having carefully considered the same, submit the following report:

A similar bill to the one now under consideration was favorably reported by this committee last session and passed the Senate. The Senate bill was also favorably reported by the House Committee on Claims.

As the committee's report (Senate Report No. 1625) made last session fully sets forth the facts in the case, your committee adopt said report as their report and recommend the passage of the bill.

The report is as follows:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5000) for the relief of the owners of the British ship Foscolia and cargo, beg leave to recommend the passage of the bill for the reasons set forth in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy and accompanying papers."

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 11, 1899.

SIR: In response to the committee's request, contained in its letter of the 9th instant, for the views and recommendation of the Department in regard to the Senate bill 5000, for the relief of the owners of the British ship Foscolia and cargo, I have the honor to state that on the 28th of May last, at 7.30 p. m., the U. S. S. Columbia, while engaged in patrol duty just outside the harbor of New York and about 12 miles southerly and easterly from the Fire Island light ship, came into collision with the British merchant steamer Foscolia. The Columbia was not seriously injured, but the Foscolia suffered much damage and sunk nine hours after the collision. There was no loss of life, the officers and crew of the Foscolia being taken on board the Columbia and cared for and brought into port, but the Foscolia and her cargo were a total loss.

It appears from the finding of a naval board of inquiry, convened to investigate and report upon the circumstances attending the collision, that at the time it occurred and for an hour and a half previously a thick fog had prevailed; that the vessels were both running at reduced speed on account of the fog; that a proper lookout was kept on both vessels; that the Foscolia was exhibiting the usual lights and sounding the fog signal, but that the Columbia had all her lights screened and was sounding no fog signal. It also appears from the finding of the court that no fault is imputed to any of the officers or men on board the Columbia, and that, aside from the screening of lights and discontinuance of the sounding of fog signals, everything that could have been done by them to avoid the catastrophe and to minimize its consequences, when it became inevitable, was done.

The testimony adduced shows that the lookouts on each vessel sighted the other at about the same time, the two vessels being about 100 yards apart, and that the Columbia was so maneuvered that a glancing blow only was received from the Foscolia, and doubtless little injury would have been caused either vessel but for the fact that the bow of the merchant steamer was caught upon one of the projecting after sponsons of the cruiser.

Upon careful consideration of the facts reported by the naval court of inquiry, above mentioned, the Department is satisfied that there is at least reasonable ground for the contention advanced by the owners of the Foscolia that the collision might have been avoided had the Columbia shown the lights and sounded the fog signals usual under such conditions. The lights and signals were, however, dispensed with by the Columbia on this occasion for the reason that the Spanish fleet under the command of Admiral Cervera had not at that time been located and the cruiser was then engaged in patrol duty in the vicinity of the most important ports of the country, New York and Philadelphia, the points between which she was cruising being Fire Island light-ship and Delaware Breakwater, and that it was deemed essential to take extraordinary precautions, even to the extent of incurring some hazard, in guarding against possibilities which might have developed at any moment.

A collision with one of our war ships having occurred under such circumstances when, for public reasons deemed sufficient to justify such action, our vessel was disregarding the rules of the road at sea, and a valuable merchant steamer and cargo belonging to a friendly power being destroyed, apparently without contributory negligence on the part of her officers and crew, it would seem proper that the losses incident thereto should not be allowed to rest upon the owners of a private vessel, but that such losses should, on the contrary, be borne by the United States, provided, of course, that it shall be judicially determined in the courts of the United States that the facts are as hereinbefore outlined.

Entertaining these views, and inasmuch as it appears that the bill (S. 5000) provides simply for the submission of all matters of fact in the case to the United States district court for the southern district of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty, and for the payment of such amount only as may be adjudged to the claimants by decree of such court, the Department recommends the bill to the favorable consideration of the committee, section 2 of the bill, making provision for the prompt payment of the amount which the court may find to be due, being deemed proper in view of the fact of the foreign ownership of the vessel lost and the desirability of avoiding in such a case the delay which would result from a resubmission of the matter to Congress for the necessary appropriation.

In this connection I desire to state that, under date of the 21st of June last, this Department addressed letters to the Committees on Naval Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, recommending favorable action in the matter of the claim of the owners of the Foscolia and cargo.

The inclosures of your communication are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

Hon. H. M. TELLER,
Chairman Senate Committee on Claims, United States Senate.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 20, 1898.

GENTLEMEN: Complying with the request contained in your communication of the 14th instant, I transmit herewith a press copy of the findings of the court of inquiry which recently investigated the collision between the U. S. S. Columbia and the steamer Foscolia. The Department's action of this date upon the case is as follows:

"The findings of the foregoing court of inquiry are approved.

"With respect to the claim of the owners of the Foscolia for damages, the Department will request Congress to authorize the submission of such claim to the United States district court for the southern district of New York for determination."

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

Messrs. COWEN, WING, PUTNAM & BURLINGHAM,
45 William street, New York City.

FINDING.

On the evening of May 28, 1898, the U. S. S. Columbia, on patrol duty, was in latitude 40° 20′ north, longitude 73° (?)′ west, and about 12 miles southerly and easterly from Fire Island light-ship. At 7.30 p. m. the course was S.W. ¼ S., and her speed 6 knots per hour. A thick fog had prevailed since 7 p. m., and the Columbia had all her lights screened and was sounding no fog signal. The British merchant steamer Foscolia was at the same time approaching on a course E. ¼ S., at a speed which had been reduced to 7½ knots on account of the fog. At 7.38 p. m. the lookout on the Columbia and the man in the forward chains sighted the Foscolia on the starboard bow.

The officer of the deck of the Columbia sounded the steam whistle twice, put the helm to starboard, and signaled the engine room for full speed ahead. The commanding officer of the Columbia, coming quickly from the emergency cabin, repeated the order for full speed ahead and sounded the siren, the collision occurring at the same moment. When the Foscolia was sighted the two vessels were about 100 yards apart. She had her starboard, port, and masthead lights set, yet none of these were visible to the Columbia until after the Foscolia's hull was seen. This is accounted for by the fact that the fog was very dense and daylight had not yet entirely disappeared. The Foscolia sighted the Columbia at about the same time that she herself was seen. The Foscolia's engines were at once reversed and given full speed astern. Her helm was put hard aport for starboard, but the distance was so short that her headway was probably not stopped until the collision occurred. The Foscolia struck the Columbia at the aft sponson on the starboard side, her stem cutting into five compartments above the protective deck. A considerable portion of her stem was left in the Columbia's side.

Measures were promptly taken for the temporary repair of the damages to the Columbia, and two of the Columbia's boats were sent to the assistance of the Foscolia. The Columbia remained in the locality nine hours, until the Foscolia sank. There was no loss of life, the crew of the Foscolia being taken on board the Columbia and cared for and brought to port. The damages to the Foscolia, occurring through the collision, caused her to sink. The court finds that the fog whistle of the Foscolia had been sounded for upward of half an hour previous to the collision, and that the whistles were not heard on board the Columbia until after the vessel was sighted. The evidence shows conclusively that the captain, officers, and men of the Columbia were attentive to their duties previous to and at the time of the collision. The same is true of the master, officers, and men of the Foscolia.

OPINION.

The court is of the opinion that when the two vessels sighted each other the distance between them was so small and their speed and relative positions were such that a collision was unavoidable. If the lights of the Columbia had been displayed it is impossible to state positively whether they would have been visible to the lookouts on the Foscolia before the Columbia's hull was in sight, but the court is of the opinion that the hull would have been first discovered. The opinion of the court is, therefore, that the absence of the Columbia's lights is not an element in the causes which produced the collision. Notwithstanding that the fog whistle on board the Foscolia was not heard on board the Columbia, the court is of the opinion that the Columbia's fog whistle might have been heard on board the Foscolia had it been sounded. The court can not, however, express a positive opinion on the subject, owing to well-known instances of sound being diverted under certain atmospheric conditions.

The court having taken into consideration the instructions in the case of the loss or grounding of a ship of the Navy, as directed by the precept, did not consider it necessary to call all the officers and crew before it, because of the fact that there had been no loss or grounding of a Navy vessel. Capt. James H. Sands, of the Columbia, had received positive orders from his superior officer in command of the northern patrol fleet to cruise without lights. The object of this order was to conceal the presence of his ship from the vessels of a nation with which the United States was at war. (See article 445 of the United States Navy Regulations.) Captain Sands directed fog signals to be suspended for the same purpose. The court is of the opinion that he was justified in so doing. The court is of the opinion that the collision between the Columbia and the Foscolia was, under the circumstances of war, in no respect due to the fault or negligence of any of the officers or members of the crew of the U. S. S. Columbia, and therefore it is of the opinion that no further proceedings should be had in the matter.

WILLIAM P. MCCANN,
Commodore, United States Navy, Retired, President.
DOUGLAS ROBEN,
United States Navy, Retired, Judge-Advocate.

Mr. CULLOM. I think there has been enough of the report read to justify the position which the Secretary of the Navy takes in the premises. The screening of those lights by the Columbia itself, it seems to me, justifies the Secretary in recommending the passage of the bill, as the vessel which was sunk could not know what it was approaching; and, so far as I am concerned, I withdraw the call for the further reading of the report.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask if the committee considered the question of whether this ship was insured or not? If she was insured with the collision clause—which is the custom with underwriters—then the owners of the ship have been paid and reimbursed for the loss of the ship and cargo, and we now propose to pass a bill paying them again the same amount. I think that question should be considered in connection with this bill. There is no question that we are liable if the U. S. S. Columbia was at fault, and any court of admiralty would have awarded damages against that ship.

I think the bill should be amended so as to provide, in the event of her being insured, that the money appropriated should go to the underwriters, and not to the owners of the ship.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California object to the further consideration of the bill?

Mr. PERKINS. I think it is the part of prudence to let the bill go over, not losing its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over without prejudice.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1744) for the relief of the Atlantic Works of Boston, Mass., was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think these bills had better all go over together. Objection has already been made to one of them, and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] who reported the bill does not appear to be in his seat at this moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 795) for the relief of The William Cramp & Sons Ship and Engine Building Company, of Philadelphia, Pa., was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let that bill go over.

JOHN O'KEANE.

The bill (S. 102) for the relief of John O'Keane, of the State of Washington, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to John O'Keane, of the State of Washington, $45, as balance of salary due him for services as a farmer in charge of Tulalip Indian Agency, Wash., for the month of October, 1882.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (S. 2258) to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that that bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

ALBERT C. BROWN.

The bill (S. 256) for the relief of Albert C. Brown was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Capt. Albert C. Brown, master of the schooner Alexandra, $1,000, in full compensation for fitting out his vessel and rescuing and transporting from the southwest end of the island of Kadiak, Alaska, to Wood Island, Alaska, the crew of the American schooner C. G. White, which was wrecked on Kadiak Island April 13, 1895.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDREW GEDDES.

The bill (S. 41) to authorize the President to place Andrew Geddes on the retired list with the rank of captain was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. That bill has been read heretofore, when there were some objections made to it, but the objections have all been withdrawn. I hope it will be passed promptly.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADOLPH VON HAAKE.

The bill (S. 8) for the correction of muster of Adolph von Haake, late major Sixty-eighth Regiment New York Veteran Volunteer Infantry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to amend the records of the War Department so as to show that Adolph von Haake was mustered into service a major of the Sixty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry on October 25, 1863, and was mustered out of service as of that grade on June 10, 1865; and he shall be held and considered to have been continuously a major between the dates specified.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE WILLIAM CRAMP & SONS COMPANY.

Mr. STEWART. I think that Order of Business No. 115, being the bill (S. 795) for the relief of the William Cramp & Sons Ship and Engine Building Company, of Philadelphia, Pa., was objected to under a misapprehension, it being supposed that it belonged to an old class to which the other bills that were objected to belong; but that was a recent transaction, occurring since 1891, and the matter of additional compensation was referred by act of Congress to the Secretary of the Navy, who has made a report recommending that the claim be referred to the Court of Claims. I do not want to have the bill laid over on account of the company it is in.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no objection in the world to Senate bill 795, to which the Senator from Nevada refers, but I think Nos. 111 and 114 in the Order of Business, being the bills for the relief of the Globe Works and the Atlantic Works, of Boston, Mass., are exactly as meritorious as the bill to which the Senator refers. Those bills have passed the Senate twice. I think they are perfectly good and proper bills, and I think the money ought to be paid. I do not believe the fact that the Government has owed the money for a long while is any reasonable ground for objection. If those bills are to be put over, to which I made no objection, as the point was raised that it was better to put all those claims over, I will submit, of course—I shall have to submit in any event, and I submit to that very gladly—but I do not see why any other bill should be picked out and given the preference when it really is of the same general class.

Mr. STEWART. Well, I have simply made the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOMESTEADS.

The bill (S. 156) to amend sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes, relating to soldiers' and sailors' homesteads, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Let that bill go over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 9, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CUSTOMS AND INTERNAL REVENUE IN THE ISLAND OF PUERTO RICO.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back House bill 6883 to extend the laws relating to customs and internal revenue over the island of Puerto Rico, ceded to the United States, with a substitute, and the recommendation that the substitute pass.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed and referred to the Union Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit the views of a portion of the minority, and ask to have them printed with the report of the majority. The views of the minority are signed by six members.

The SPEAKER. They will be printed and referred to the Union Calendar with the report.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit individual views on the same matter.

The SPEAKER. Ordered to be printed with the others, and referred to the Union Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, doubtless a large number of these reports, with the views of the minority, will be called for. I have consulted with several members of the committee, and I ask unanimous consent that 10,000 extra copies of the report and the views of the minority be printed and placed in the folding room to the credit of members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, asks unanimous consent that 10,000 extra copies of the report of the majority, with the views of the minority, be printed and put to the credit of the members in the folding room of the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PAYNE. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to give notice that I shall call up this bill on Thursday, the 15th of February, and ask the House for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, gives notice that he will call the bill up for consideration on Thursday next.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WEEKS. I rise to a question of personal privilege, and I ask that the Chair direct the Clerk to read certain extracts from newspapers which I have handed to him for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Virginian-Pilot, of Norfolk, Va.]

WISE-YOUNG CONTEST—REPUBLICAN GUILTY OF BREACH OF FAITH.

When the report was submitted to the House this afternoon there was an attempt made by Representative WEEKS to have it considered, and he asked unanimous consent for that purpose. It is probable the House would have assented had it not been for Representative BURKE of Texas, who is to make the minority report. When the report of the majority was submitted to the full committee, on Wednesday last, it was expressly stipulated that ten days would be granted the minority in which to prepare their report, when both would be submitted to the House simultaneously.

BREACH OF FAITH.

There is a breach of faith in the matter which a member of the committee is responsible for, and it created considerable surprise when the majority report was submitted this afternoon. Rumor says it was the purpose of the Republicans to take an advantage of the Democrats by reason of what was supposed to be Representative BURKE'S absence. However, that gentleman happened to be in the cloakroom of the House, and when he heard what was going on he paid his compliments in no uncertain manner to the majority for the unfairness they had shown. He succeeded in gaining his full time—ten days—in which to report; hence, it is not a certainty that the House will adopt the report of the majority.

[From the Norfolk Public Ledger.]

THE WISE-YOUNG CONTEST.

[Special dispatch to the Public Ledger.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 2, 1900.

The breach of faith on the part of Representative WEEKS of Michigan with Judge BURKE of Texas, on the matter of allowing the latter ten days in which to prepare a minority report in the Wise-Young contest, is severely criticised to-day. But for the accidental presence of Judge BURKE yesterday the report of Election Committee No. 3 might have been rushed through and the seat awarded to Wise without a hearing before the House. Judge BURKE detected WEEKS in his dishonorable act and severely excoriated him, with the result that by unanimous consent of the House he was allowed the time asked for. This is regarded as a favorable omen for Mr. Young, and it is more than probable that WEEKS'S sneaking act may result in turning some Republican votes, or in others refraining from voting.

[From the Richmond News.]

IN FAVOR OF SEATING WISE—REPORT SUBMITTED TO THE HOUSE IN THE YOUNG-WISE CASE—THE REPUBLICANS ACTED UNFAIRLY—FAITH NOT KEPT WITH THE MINORITY IN THE TIME OF PRESENTING THE REPORT—PROBABLE ACTION ON IT.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1900.

Representative WEEKS of Michigan to-day submitted to the House the majority report of Elections Committee No. 3 in the Wise-Young contest, Second Virginia district. The majority of the committee all report in favor of seating Wise. The report, in substance, says:

"The evidence in this contest is of the same character as in the contest of two years ago. The mass of fraud uncovered by the contestant's testimony leaves no doubt in the minds of the committee that he is entitled to the seat by a large majority."

VOTE OF NORFOLK.

The report proceeds to an analysis of the vote of the city of Norfolk and declares: "The evidence overwhelmingly establishes the fact that the judges of election in Norfolk were in collusion with the interests of the contestee." The returns from Longview are also questioned by the majority of the committee and finally rejected. The report states that the returns from the Court-House precinct "can not stand for a minute." The correct returns for Isle of Wight County are declared by the committee to be:

Young, 415; Wise, 426. The returns from Powhatan precinct are rejected on account of manifest fraud, and the correct vote for James City is declared to be, Young, 25; Wise, 287. The various precincts in Nansemond County are figured in tables in the report, with little comment, and the summary of the majority of the committee gives Young 49 votes, Wise 1,171 votes. The majority of the committee make the vote of Princess Anne County to be, Young, 281; Wise, 426. In Southampton County the majority of the committee give Young 527 votes and Wise 625 votes. Warwick, according to the committee, gave Young 174 and Wise 211. York County is made to give Young 64 votes and Wise 715. Portsmouth, as the committee has corrected the vote, gives Young 1,189, Wise 418.

THE TOTAL VOTE.

Williamsburg is made to give Young no votes and Wise 117 votes. Exclusive of Surry, the committee foot up the total correct vote as Young, 3,668; Wise, 4,553. Adding the uncontested returns from counties of Charles City and Elizabeth City, Norfolk County and city of Newport News, which gave Young 2,148 votes and Wise 2,697 votes, the committee figures that the total correct vote would be, Young, 4,816, and Wise, 7,250.

Accordingly, they make out that Dr. Wise has a clear majority of 2,434. If the returns from Surry were allowed to stand as they were reported, the committee finds that Dr. Wise would still have a majority of 1,947 votes.

When the report was submitted to the House this afternoon there was an attempt made by Representative WEEKS to have it considered, and he asked unanimous consent for that purpose. It is probable the House would have assented had it not been for Representative BURKE of Texas, who is to make the minority report. When the report of the majority was submitted to the full committee on Wednesday last it was expressly stipulated that ten days would be granted the minority in which to prepare their report, when both would be submitted to the House simultaneously.

BREACH OF FAITH.

There is a breach of faith in the matter which a member of the committee is responsible for, and it created considerable surprise when the majority report was submitted this afternoon. Rumor says it was the purpose of the Republicans to take an advantage of the Democrats by reason of what was supposed to be Representative BURKE'S absence. However, that gentleman happened to be in the cloakroom of the House, and when he heard what was going on he paid his compliments in no uncertain manner to the majority for the unfairness they had shown. He succeeded in gaining his full time—ten days—in which to report; hence it is not a certainty that the House will adopt the report of the majority.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman from Michigan will allow me to state that my colleague from Texas [Judge BURKE] is not present this morning.

A MEMBER. He is in the cloakroom and will be here in a moment.

Mr. LANHAM. I am informed that my colleague is in the cloakroom.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has sent for Judge BURKE.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I have no quarrel with Judge BURKE on this subject. But I learn from reliable sources that this alleged "news" has been telegraphed all over the State of Virginia. All its newspapers are full of it. Now, I ask the Speaker to direct the Clerk to read from the record of this House showing what did take place on the occasion referred to, when I, as chairman of the subcommittee, under instructions of the whole committee, presented the report of the Wise-Young contested-election case.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows from the proceedings of February 1, 1900:

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—WISE VS. YOUNG.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Elections No. 3 to file the report of the committee in the contested-election case of Wise against Young, from the Second district of Virginia, and ask that a time may be fixed for the hearing before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Report of Committee on Elections No. 3 in the case of Wise against Young."

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed, and the case will go on the House Calendar.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Michigan if he has made the request agreed on in the committee in reference to filing the views of the minority?

Mr. WEEKS. I was about to make that statement to the Chair. I would like to have the time fixed for the hearing, and what would the gentleman like?

Mr. BURKE of Texas. It was agreed in committee, Mr. Speaker, that the members of the minority should have ten days in which to present their views after the presentation of the report of the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. That would be satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, ten days will be given to the minority in which to file their views. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that he can call the case up at any time.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, the record as read shows precisely what occurred. Now, I have no fault to find with Judge BURKE, nor do I wish to make any animadversion upon the conduct of anyone in this matter save those who are responsible for publishing the "news" that has been read from those Virginia papers.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to denounce the statements in those newspapers as absolutely false wherein they charge me with any wrongdoing, breach of faith, or other improper conduct in the premises.

I do not know who the author of those telegraphic gems of "news" may be, but he is evidently a cheerful and willing prevaricator. I hope I use proper parliamentary language. Some people elsewhere would denounce the sender out of such news by a much harsher name, but I hope to use diplomatic and parliamentary terms in this great presence.

I do not know in whose interests this kind of slanderous news is given out, but leave that to the House and to the public to decide. I will not delay the public business with any extended remarks. The facts now before the House are sufficient for my purpose. But I will venture to remark that, while I do not object to reasonable or even unreasonable criticism within the lines of truth upon anything I may say or do in this House, this is neither reasonable nor unreasonable criticism, nor within gunshot of the truth. Besides, it is an assault upon a member of the House in an official act, charging conduct not only unbecoming in a member, but so reprehensible as to require attention. Furthermore, it is an attack upon the members of the majority of the committee, as members of the House, inasmuch as the chairman of a subcommittee could not do the things charged without their connivance or consent. It is thus an assault upon the very integrity of the House itself.

I may say, too, sir, that this is an assault upon the Speaker of this House, because such a thing as is alleged in those newspapers could not take place without the Speaker knowing something about it. His long experience as a parliamentarian upon the floor of this House would render him so alert, so ready to take note of what was going on, that such a thing would be impossible.

Besides, it is a gross violation of the reportorial privileges of the House, freely granted to the representatives of the press, and in the very essence of the thing a matter which the House should protect itself and its members against by putting the seal of its condemnation upon it.

This great and honorable body, the greatest in the world of legislation, can not afford to pass in silence such base and slanderous assaults upon its officers and members. Criticism is criticism, but lying is lying, and slander is slander, and I am unwilling to sit silent and permit this thing to pass without a challenge and a most emphatic denial. [Applause.]

ASSISTANT BOOKKEEPER FOR SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. JOY. I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts. That committee has directed me to report back favorably the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the following resolution, introduced January 23, 1900, by Mr. JOY:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House is hereby authorized to employ an assistant bookkeeper in his office for the remainder of the present Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $75 per month.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to this resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JOY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that House bill 3718, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, has been placed upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where, I submit to the Chair, the bill does not belong. The bill does not provide for the raising of revenue; neither does it carry an appropriation; therefore I move the proper reference, which will be the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, upon inspection of the bill, thinks that the proper place for it is the House Calendar; and without objection, the change will be made.

Mr. CANNON. Does the bill provide for any charge upon the Treasury?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the bill read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3718) for the preservation of the frigate Constitution.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to place the frigate Constitution, now lying at the Boston Navy-Yard, as near as may be consistent with her preservation, in the same condition as regards her hull and rigging as she was when in active service: Provided, That before beginning on such work a sufficient sum of money to complete such work shall be raised through the agency of the Massachusetts State Society United States Daughters of 1812 and placed at his disposal for the purpose.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to this bill going on the Calendar indicated, by unanimous consent; but it does seem to me that it provides for an expenditure. At least, it employs Government officers. It provides that the Government shall be reimbursed. While that is true, it does involve a public expenditure, as it seems to me, nevertheless.

I have no objection to its going on the Calendar by unanimous consent; but as a matter of right, it seems to me, it ought to be on the Union Calendar under the rule.

Mr. PAYNE. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he ask unanimous consent to take up the bill for consideration now.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the gentleman from New York that after consultation with the Speaker of the House it was understood that we would move for the consideration of this bill on the call of committees. With that understanding, while I thank the gentleman for his suggestion, we desire to wait and take our chances under the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. An inspection of this bill satisfies the Chair that it lays no burden upon the Government. The money to do this work must be provided for, in the first instance, as the Chair understands the language of the bill, by other means than through the Treasury of the United States; but as the House Calendar is to be taken up at once, if the gentleman will ask unanimous consent, the Chair will submit a request for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 3718, which has just been read to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, before consent is given, we should like to have an explanation of the bill. It has been impossible for us to hear what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I will endeavor to speak sufficiently loud to enable the gentleman to hear me. I fully appreciate the great difficulty of hearing on one side of the Chamber what is said on the other side, in the confusion that sometimes exists.

With the permission of the Chair, I will surrender the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] who introduced this bill and can answer all the questions which any gentleman may see fit to put.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS].

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take the time of the House upon this measure unless members desire information concerning it, in which case I would be very glad indeed to furnish all information within my knowledge.

A MEMBER. What is it about?

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be read, and also the report accompanying it, which I trust will give full information to the members of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the bill having been read, if there be no objection, the reading will be confined to the report. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. BUTLER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3718) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to place the frigate Constitution in the same condition as regards her hull and rigging as she was when in active service, beg leave to submit the following report:

The frigate Constitution, better known as "Old Ironsides," is now moored to a wharf at the Boston Navy-Yard, where she has been since her removal from Portsmouth, N. H., in 1897. Her hull is protected from the weather by a roof, but dry rot has attacked her once staunch timbers and they are fast going to decay. The achievements of "Old Ironsides" during the war of 1812, filling as they do so proud and glorious a page of American history, have endeared this grand old ship to our people and enshrined her in the affections of a loyal and patriotic nation. The Massachusetts State Society United States Daughters of 1812 solicit the privilege of furnishing a sufficient sum of money to defray the entire cost of placing the Constitution in the same condition as regards her hull and rigging as she was when in active service. It is more than a work of patriotism with these ladies—it is a labor of love and reverence, and they feel they have a legitimate claim to the honor of carrying it out, because many of them are the direct descendants of the men who helped build the ship, fought upon her decks, and commanded her when she gained her epoch-making victories. The Government will be at no expense whatever under the plan proposed for the restoration and preservation of this famous vessel; the patriotic impulses of our people will be stimulated, and a striking and curious object lesson of the development and growth of the nation will be handed down to future generations in the form of the, to us, quaint old battle ship which first made our nation famous on the seas.

The Secretary of the Navy, urging the speedy consideration and passage of this bill, submitted the following:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, December 4, 1899.

SIR: The Massachusetts State Society United States Daughters of 1812 has informed the Department that it desires to restore the old frigate Constitution to a serviceable condition, in order that she may be again placed in commission and used as a training ship, or in such manner as may be deemed best by the Secretary of the Navy, the cost of such restoration to be defrayed by popular subscription, and the work to be done at the navy-yard, Boston, Mass., and carried on and completed to the satisfaction of the Department. The society has also, in pursuance of this object, requested the Department to recommend the passage of an act by the Congress granting the necessary authority in the premises.

The Constitution as she exists to-day is a relic of the glory of the Navy in its early days, and the fact that the memory of her prowess is still cherished among the people is a gratifying evidence of patriotism that should be encouraged. The restoration of this old man-of-war for the Government by voluntary contribution from the people, under the auspices of this society, would be an object lesson of great value to the nation.

I have the honor, therefore, considering also the serviceability to the Navy of the ship should she be restored, to recommend the early passage of an act authorizing her rehabilitation in the manner proposed, providing, however, that the work shall be done under the supervision of and as directed by the Department.

Very respectfully, JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS, United States Senate.

In view of the above facts, and the further fact that the Massachusetts State Society United States Daughters of 1812, in raising the funds to defray the expense of such refitting of the Constitution, will present to the public an object lesson in patriotic devotion of great value, your committee recommend that said bill do pass.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be no opposition to the consideration of the bill which has been reported to the House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania who is on the Naval Affairs Committee. The legislation proposed in this bill seeks to give to the Daughters of Eighteen Hundred and Twelve the right to rehabilitate the grand old frigate Constitution without any expense to the Government. It was my privilege during my first term in Congress to obtain the passage through the House of an appropriation sufficient to put this vessel in proper condition to make the trip from Portsmouth to Boston on the occasion of the one hundredth anniversary of her construction. The citizens of Massachusetts have a just pride in the history of this great ship. The waters of Massachusetts Bay were the first to greet her. She was built by Massachusetts mechanics, and during the greater part of her historic career was manned by Massachusetts sailors. At the celebration which was held in Boston in October, 1897, fitting honors were paid to this monument of the naval victories of the war of 1812. People from all parts of the State of Massachusetts flocked to Boston to join in honoring her glorious deeds, and the occasion was one which will live in the memories of those who witnessed the events of that day.

The Daughters of Eighteen Hundred and Twelve have taken a deserved pride in the history of the vessel, and are anxious to have her refitted and put in the same condition as regards her hull and rigging as she was when in active service without any expense to the Government. It is an undertaking which I know will receive the plaudits not only of this House, but of the people of the entire country, who have a proper appreciation of the grand work that has been accomplished by this ship for the preservation of the Union. In every war since the foundation of the Government until the present day the sons of Massachusetts have come to the aid of the Government in a magnificent manner, and enduring monuments are raised to-day in all portions of that State to the valor and brave deeds of her sons. But I think that dearer to them than all else is the grand old hulk of the Constitution, which now lies at the Charlestown Navy-Yard and which not only typifies the heroism of Americans of a century ago, but will stand for all time as an incentive to greater deeds and greater glory at the hands of the American youth of future generations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER (at 12 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.). The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk having proceeded with the call, the Committee on the Judiciary was called.

COURT IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2936) changing the place for holding court in the central division of the Indian Territory from Cameron to Poteau, and for other purposes.

The original bill was read, with an amendment recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Strike out all of the original bill and insert the following:

"That subdivision 3 of chapter 145 of the United States Statutes at Large, approved March 1, 1895, entitled 'An act to provide for the appointment of additional judges of the United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes,' which said subdivision reads as follows: 'The central district shall consist of all the Choctaw country, and the places of holding court in said district shall be at South McAlester, Atoka, Antlers, and Cameron,' be amended by striking out of said subdivision the word 'Cameron' and inserting in lieu thereof the word 'Poteau,' so that said subdivision when amended shall read as follows: 'The central district shall consist of all the Choctaw country, and the places of holding court in said district shall be at South McAlester, Atoka, Antlers, and Poteau.'

"SEC. 2. That all suits, prosecutions, and processes, recognizances, bail bonds, and other proceedings of whatever nature pending in or returnable to said court at Cameron are hereby transferred to and shall be made returnable and have force in said court at Poteau."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] ten minutes, if he desires that time.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DEPOSITIONS DE BENE ESSE.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 92) to amend section 864 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to taking depositions de bene esse.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 864 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 864. Every person deposing as provided in the preceding section shall be cautioned and sworn to testify the whole truth, and carefully examined.

"His testimony shall be reduced to writing or typewriting by the magistrate, under his personal supervision, or by himself in the magistrate's presence, and shall, after it has been reduced to writing or typewriting, be subscribed by the deponent."

With the following amendments:

Line 10, strike out the words "magistrate or" and insert in lieu thereof the words "officer taking the deposition, or by some person."

Line 11, after the word "by" insert the words "the deponent," and in the same line strike out the word "magistrate's" and insert in lieu thereof the word "officer's," and in the same line, after the word "presence" insert the words "and by no other person."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the bill will be read as it will read after it is amended.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] desires to have the bill read as it will read with the amendments agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill as it will read when amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 864. Every person deposing as provided in the preceding section shall be cautioned and sworn to testify the whole truth, and carefully examined.

His testimony shall be reduced to writing or typewriting by the officer taking the deposition, or by some person under his personal supervision, or by the deponent himself in the officer's presence, and by no other person, and shall, after it has been reduced to writing or typewriting, be subscribed by the deponent.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would say for the information of the House that this makes no change in existing law, excepting to provide for the taking of depositions in typewriting as well as in pen writing, there having been some question raised and a diversity of holding as to whether or not a deposition could be taken in typewriting. It also changes the word "magistrate" to "officer." The person designated to take a deposition is not always a magistrate, and for that reason it is more appropriate to say the "officer" taking the deposition.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CUBAN VESSELS.

Mr. GROSVENOR (when the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called). Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to report back the bill (H. R. 5074) relating to Cuban vessels and ask that it lie on the table. A bill in that regard coming from the Senate has been passed by the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

LIGHTS ON STEAM PILOT VESSELS.

Mr. LYBRAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 5288) relating to lights on steam pilot vessels.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5288) relating to lights on steam pilot vessels.

Be it enacted, etc., That a steam pilot vessel, when engaged on her station on piloting duty and in waters of the United States, and not at anchor, shall, in addition to the lights required for all pilot boats, carry at a distance of 8 feet below her white masthead light a red light, visible all around the horizon, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere at a distance of at least 2 miles, and also the colored side lights required to be carried by vessels when under way.

When engaged on her station on pilotage duty and in waters of the United States, and at anchor, she shall carry, in addition to the lights required for all pilot boats, the red light above mentioned, but not the colored side lights.

When not engaged on her station on pilotage duty, she shall carry the same lights as other steam vessels.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be construed as supplementary to Article VIII of the act approved June 7, 1897, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States," and to Article VIII of an act approved August 19, 1890, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions at sea."

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect on June 30, 1900.

Mr. LYBRAND. Mr. Speaker, this bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Under the revised international regulations for preventing collisions at sea and the laws of the United States for the prevention of collisions on inland waters there is no provision for a distinctive light for steam pilot vessels when engaged on their stations. This makes the United States regulations conform with those of other nations, especially Great Britain.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LYBRAND, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LOG ENTRY OF COLLISIONS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 5066) to amend section 4290 of the Revised Statutes, relating to log entry of collisions.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4290 of the Revised Statutes be amended by adding the following:

"Twelfth. In every case of collision in which it is practicable so to do, the master shall, immediately after the occurrence, cause a statement thereof, and of the circumstances under which the same occurred, to be entered in the official log book. Such entry shall be made in the manner prescribed in section 4291, and failure to make such entry shall subject the offender to the penalties prescribed by section 4292."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect sixty days after its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this bill has just been reported, and is not yet upon the Calendar. The Chair thinks that unanimous consent of the House should be obtained for its consideration.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FORDNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEVING CERTAIN ENLISTED MEN FROM THE CHARGE OF DESERTION.

Mr. FOSS (when the Committee on Naval Affairs was called). Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to call up the bill H. R. 969.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 969) to amend section 5 of an act to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion, approved August 14, 1888.

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 890, volume 25, of the United States Statutes at Large, entitled "An act to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion," approved August 14, 1888, be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted.

SEC. 2. That section 5 of the said act be, and is hereby, so amended as to remove the limitation of time within which applications for relief may be received and acted upon under the provisions of said act.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. FOSS. I will ask the Clerk to read the report.

Mr. PAYNE. From what I could hear of the reading, it seems to me to extend some privilege, and I suppose that bill does not strictly belong to the House Calendar. I understand it extends the time in which something is to be done and grants some further right. I did not catch the reading of the bill completely.

Mr. FOSS. I will ask for the reading of the report. I think that will explain the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point that it does not properly belong to the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Pending the point of order, the report will be read in the gentleman's time.

The report (by Mr. DAYTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 969) to amend section 5 of an act to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion, approved August 14, 1888, having carefully considered the same, report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass for the following reasons:

The Fiftieth Congress passed an act, approved August 14, 1888, and found in volume 25 of United States Statutes at Large, page 442, providing for the relief of certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from charges of desertion. The act was carefully considered and drawn, and by its terms the Secretary of the Navy was given the discretion to remove such charges. This discretion, however, was subject to reasonable conditions and carefully safeguarded.

The operation of the act, however, was, by a proviso to section 5, limited to those who should apply for relief within a period of five years from and after its passage, and it has, therefore, for all practical purposes, become inoperative.

While in force the law seemed to be entirely satisfactory in its operations, and no good or sufficient reason is apparent why it should not be given full force and application. On the other hand, Congress is burdened with a large number of private bills seeking to remove these charges in individual cases, many of which are meritorious in character, but which, by reason of the arduous duties from other sources of the Naval Committee, do not and can not receive consideration, or if reported by the committee more often fail of consideration in the House.

This bill would remove the time limit for application contained in the act of 1888, and restore the Secretary of the Navy's power to dispose of these cases under reasonable conditions.

It may be pertinently added that similar bills have been unanimously recommended by this committee in the Fifty-fourth and Fifty-fifth Congresses, and the power which will be conferred upon the Secretary of the Navy will be the same which the Secretary of War under existing law now has in like cases arising in the Army.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I gather from the reading of the report the bill would give these men, if the charge of desertion were removed, back pay or a right to pension, and that would be a charge upon the Treasury. I do not think the bill is on the proper Calendar.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentleman from West Virginia, who prepared the report and who is more familiar with the subject than I am.

Mr. PAYNE. The point of order is pending, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from West Virginia on the point of order.

Mr. DAYTON. I desire to say a word upon the point of order. I think if the gentleman had carefully examined the statute he would have ascertained that the point of order is not well taken. This is not new legislation that will give any new or additional privilege to the parties, but it simply, under existing legislation, removes the restriction of time in which an application can be made. I hope the gentleman will note the distinction I make. The law is on the statute book. This enables all these parties now provided for to file their applications at any period of time.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. DAYTON. Very well.

Mr. PAYNE. Now they can not get any right, unless you pass this legislation, to draw back pay or apply for pension. If you do pass the bill it removes the disability and allows them to get back pay and pension that they are now disabled from getting.

Mr. DAYTON. So far as the question of back pay is concerned, I do not think there is any possibility of that question arising. So far as their position to apply for a pension is concerned, that is a relative question, as the law of 1890 extends to these men a pension anyhow. If they have engaged in other service of the Government they can apply for pension.

Mr. PAYNE. They can apply, but can not get pensions on account of this charge standing against them.

Mr. DAYTON. This strikes out the five years' limitation that was placed in the original act, and would leave it with the same restrictions now applicable to the Army. We are constantly passing bill after bill to remove these charges of desertion, and the whole of that kind of legislation can well be relegated from the halls of Congress and placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, as it is now in the hands of the Secretary of War.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is speaking on the question of the merits of the bill. The point that I make is that it is not on the proper Calendar.

Mr. FOSS. I hope that the gentleman will not insist on that point.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not see that I can refrain from making the point. We have this order, and I think we ought to conform strictly to it. This bill should be on the House Calendar, in my opinion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, believing this does not impose any burden on the Government; it is simply extending the time within which application may be made for the removal of the charge of desertion. Effacing the record of desertion is the thing aimed at by this bill. Non constat that a dollar is due to anyone. The assumption is entirely too remote, and it seems to the Chair clear that if any bill can properly be on the House Calendar this can be.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia if this bill gives the men in the Navy the same rights that the soldiers in the Army have?

Mr. DAYTON. Exactly the same.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the proposition before the House, this act gives to the men of the Navy the same privileges as are now accorded the men in the Army. I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia if this is so?

Mr. DAYTON. Exactly the same.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Then, Mr. Speaker, I certainly hope this bill will pass. I think there are many deserving cases of men who have served honorably in the Navy, but who, for some reason or other, are unjustly charged as deserters.

I have knowledge of two or three cases myself where men, after four years of faithful and honorable service in the Navy during the war, were separated from the service without discharge.

Many men after the war was over left their ships immediately, so as to get home to their families, and never bothered about a discharge. Hundreds of cases of this kind occurred, and I think the Secretary of the Navy, who has access to the records, is much better able to handle this question than Congress.

I certainly think the Navy has justified this confidence in all periods of our history, and I hope this bill will receive the unanimous support of the House.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia if he has examined the law and knows that the same limitations are placed on the men in the Navy who are charged with desertion that are placed upon soldiers in the Army who are so charged? If they are, there can be no harm in the bill, but if it leaves it entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, so that he can discharge Jones to-day and not Smith to-morrow, then it is a very dangerous bill and it may involve the Treasury of the United States in a vast sum of money which ought not to be paid to men who did not make an honorable record.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DAYTON. I do.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I had the honor of reporting this bill in the last Congress from the Committee on Naval Affairs. I will say, in response to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], that the same limitations exactly apply here as are placed upon the soldiers in the Army. This bill simply proposes to give the Secretary of the Navy the same power as the Secretary of War. When the original bill was passed it limited the power of the Secretary of the Navy to five years. That limit is passed, and to-day the inevitable result follows. We have in the Committee on Naval Affairs over 100 private bills for the removal of the charge of desertion against sailors and marines. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the Secretary of the Navy is more capable of judging of the merits of these cases with the record before him than is the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is unjust to the Committee on Naval Affairs not to give the Secretary of the Navy the same power the Secretary of War possesses in similar cases.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. DAYTON. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

Mr. MADDOX. I want to address a question to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS]. If the Secretary of War has the right to remove charges of desertion, why do we have so many bills upon the Calendar to remove charges of desertion?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The bill differs in no wise from the Army law in such cases.

Mr. MADDOX. I understand that the object of this bill is to confer a like authority on the Secretary of the Navy that is held by the Secretary of War.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Exactly.

Mr. MADDOX. It has been almost impossible to hear what was going on on the other side of the House, and as it seems to be a very important bill we want to get at the object of it.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to the gentleman from Georgia that there is no excuse, in my opinion, for any bill being presented in this House to relieve a soldier from the charge of desertion, if he was not a real deserter and ought to have the benefit that soldiers have who made an honorable record, for the Secretary of War can remove the charge.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. DAYTON. I will yield in a moment to my friend from Indiana. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

Mr. MADDOX. I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] that he ought to come here Friday night and tell the committee what he has just stated in regard to these bills for desertion.

Mr. STEELE. I have done that a dozen times. I think it an outrage——

Mr. MADDOX. I agree with you.

Mr. STEELE (continuing). That pension bills and bills for deserters should have the same privilege in this House.

Mr. MADDOX. I agree with you. I think this is a proper bill, as it proposes to put the thing where it belongs.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that I also agree with him in this matter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana and Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

Mr. DAYTON. I promised the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from New Jersey that I would yield to them, and I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What I wished to ascertain was whether there are not many cases presented over which the military or naval authorities have no jurisdiction.

Mr. STEELE. I think there are many such; but they are cases which ought not to be presented in the House; because if the persons were not in fact deserters, in my opinion the Secretary of War is empowered to give relief in all meritorious cases.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I think I can throw a little light on this controversy. About 1889, I think—somewhere about that time, perhaps earlier—a bill was passed in Congress——

Mr. DAYTON. The act was approved August 14, 1888.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That bill was passed with the declared intent and purpose on the part of Congress to cover every meritorious case where a man was improperly marked on the record as a deserter. The bill was very carefully prepared; the friends of the soldiers who had been complaining were heard; and every possible case deserving of consideration was covered by the bill. The Secretary of War was authorized to remove the charge of desertion upon proof that brought the case within any one of six or seven classes named in the act.

Now, that law had a limitation in its operation. In my judgment, all the men who deserved to have their records set right should have come in under that law and obtained relief. But a great many are now making application who could not come under that law—men who would come under the condemnation of those who passed that law. Yet there are meritorious cases where the parties did not hear of this law, did not know of its existence; so that years passed without their having the opportunity to have the charge of desertion removed from their military record. I do not think there are very many such cases; and I would almost indorse the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] that those men who, from 1865 down to this time, have stood by and never made any successful effort to get the facts of their cases before the War Department when it was within the jurisdiction of that Department to give them relief have very little merit in any application they may make now.

Mr. DAYTON. Just one word. The act by which we gave this relief to enlisted men in the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States was approved August 14, 1888. The provisions are the same as have been stated by the gentleman from Ohio. The only trouble about the matter was that this proviso was attached to the fifth section:

> That all applications for relief under this act shall be made to and filed with the Secretary of the Navy within a period of five years from and after its passage; and all applications not so made and filed within the said term of five years shall be forever barred, and shall not be received or considered.

Now, the purpose and object of this bill is simply to repeal that clause and enable parties to apply under the law for the relief which the act contemplates, though they may not have filed their applications within five years from the passage of the act. This law was found to operate beneficially; no complaint ever arose under it; it removed a vast burden from the shoulders of Congress in the consideration of these cases. Application after application of men who desired to be relieved from these charges of desertion has been made to the Navy Department and has come back here with the stereotyped reply that the Department is powerless to consider the case because of the proviso which I have just read.

I wish to say that the Secretary of the Navy in at least three of the last reports submitted by him to Congress has recommended the passage of this legislation. It has been earnestly sought for by the Judge-Advocate-General's Office, because almost the same labor involved in passing upon and determining the merits of these applications for the removal of the charge of desertion has been done by that Department anyhow. After going to the Department the party comes to the halls of Congress asking relief; and before it is granted we ask the advice of the Department, together with the record of the man, in order to determine whether we shall grant the relief or not. So that I think, under the circumstances, there can be no reasonable objection to this measure.

As my colleague on the committee [Mr. CUMMINGS] has stated, it has been reported favorably by us in at least two prior Congresses.

Mr. TALBERT. Does this apply to soldiers in the Army or——

Mr. DAYTON. Only to enlisted men in the Navy and Marine Corps. By other legislation now in force the soldiers of the Army have the same relief.

Mr. TALBERT. Is the time within which application may be made unlimited?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes, sir. I now yield to my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I have been interested in this bill for some years. It proposes to make this privilege as to the Navy exactly what it is now under the law with reference to the Army; in other words, that there shall be no mere time limit upon the right to apply to the Department in proper form to set aside a record of desertion.

While serving as chairman of the Military Affairs subcommittee, having jurisdiction of cases of this kind, I was astonished to find how many cases there are where men do not know that they were marked as deserters. There are cases where men have reenlisted, where they have gone through the war and left the service after the war was over, and never found out that they were technically guilty of desertion until, upon making application for a pension, they found themselves so disgraced. There are cases of that sort to this day, and some of them are the very best men who served in the Army. I will go further, and say that I think the general law itself needs some amendment.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I want to ask, if this bill is passed, will that prevent the introduction here of private bills for the removal of the charge of desertion?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. To the extent that they are covered by this statute, it will, but not in all cases.

Mr. TALBERT. If it will do that, I think it is a good bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. You ought to be in favor of it. Now, I want to add that there are some bills that have to be introduced in Congress. The committee upon which I have had the honor to sit have turned down nine-tenths of these bills, but I secured the passage of two bills through Congress, one to cover the case of a man who had left his command because he was worn out on the march from Fredericksburg to Antietam, and died. Yet his sergeant had put him down as a deserter. The Secretary of War said that under the law he had no power to change that record, although he was satisfied that the man died in the field.

There are changes that ought to be made, perhaps, in the law to cover the really just cases; and if we could get a law that would provide for all just cases, and remove the charge of desertion in such cases by general law instead of by special legislation, it would be a consummation devoutly to be wished. Let us ask the aid of gentlemen on both sides in securing that result. But this at least we can do now, by providing that when a man comes to the Secretary of the Navy and asks him to remove such a charge and shows that he did not know of it before, and a mere time limit forces the Secretary of the Navy to say to him that he has no power, that limit ought to be removed. We have removed it as to the Army, and it ought to be removed now as to the Navy.

Mr. DAYTON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE].

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, this discussion has suggested to me a recollection of the acts relative to the Army removing the limitation of time during which the charge of desertion might be expunged. I find by referring to the acts that in the one approved in May, 1886, the limitation was made five years. In 1892 Congress passed another act, extending the limitation or reviving the right under the law to have a charge of desertion removed in that way for two years longer. Finally, in 1895, the limitation of time which had previously been imposed, during which these applications for the removal of the charge of desertion must be made, was absolutely repealed as far as the soldiers of the war of 1861–1865 and the Mexican war were concerned.

As I understand the pending measure, it simply proposes to place the sailors and Marine Corps upon the same footing as the soldiers of the war of 1861–1865 and the Mexican war. It is a matter of simple justice, and I can not conceive any reasonable objection which can be made to this tardy act of justice to the sailors and marines of the United States.

Mr. DAYTON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I concur in the views expressed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE], and I am heartily in accord with this provision. I take the floor to say that I hope that some bill will come into the House to reenact the law, which by limitation has expired, permitting the granting of this relief to the soldiers of the war of 1861–1865, and thus impose upon a Department so much better able to handle the subject the labor that is now upon the shoulders of the members of this House in granting relief in meritorious cases. I think no better reform upon this subject could be accomplished than by legislation in direct line with this measure, which concerns only certain branches. I hope it may be extended so as to give relief to the soldiers in the Army along the same line as the law which has expired by limitation.

Mr. DAYTON. I yield so much time as the gentleman may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I think a minute is all I want. I am not familiar with the provisions of this bill. I understand it gives certain power to the Secretary of the Navy to remove charges of desertion. There is a class of cases in which that power ought to be lodged somewhere, to remove a charge of desertion. I have a case in point, a bill now pending before the Committee on Military Affairs.

A farmer boy, of good habits, a private in an Indiana regiment, on the march of his regiment to Stone River, was taken very sick and was seemingly in extremis, so that he could not march farther. Two comrades left him by the roadside, satisfied that he would die. In more than thirty years he never had been heard from, although the family exercised great diligence for the first two or three years in trying to find his whereabouts. There is no doubt in my mind and in the minds of the people who knew him that he died. Yet the charge of desertion is there. Now, there ought to be power somewhere to remove that charge of desertion other than by legislation, because, suppose there are a hundred cases of that kind, you can not hope to pass a hundred special bills. I do not know that I can hope to pass this one.

You may say it opens the door to unworthy people, who might be relieved from the charge of desertion. I do not know how much danger there is of that, but it seems to me some general legislation might be enacted that would take care of such cases, where there was no actual desertion.

Mr. DAYTON. I call for the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DAYTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the call of committees.

The Clerk resumed and completed the call of committees.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 9, 1900.

The Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord God of hosts, as the nation to-day, through its representatives, consigns the form of one of our most gallant and heroic soldiers, earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust, to a worthy resting place, among the graves of scores and hundreds of our brave and devoted soldiers, we humbly pray that the spirit which inspired these men with love and service for the country may possess the hearts and souls of the citizens from one end of the land to the other. Make us worthy of this country, which Thou has granted us, with all its glorious memories, with all its glorious institutions.

We humbly and devoutly beseech Thee, O Lord God, of Thy tender mercy, be gracious unto the wife and the children who are bereaved and sit shrouded in unspeakable sorrow and grief to-day. Let Thy care be upon all sufferers, upon those who are bereaved. Keep us, guide us, and bring us at last to the home of Thy people in heaven. Through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Amen.

Amend Senate amendment to said bill by adding at the end thereof the following section:

No association shall be organized in a city the population of which exceeds 50,000 persons with a capital of less than $200,000.'"

Mr. JONES of Arkansas submitted the following amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BURROWS, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to Isabella Morrow to withdraw the papers on file in the Senate in the matter of her application for a pension (S. 1128, first session Fifty-fourth Congress), in accordance with the rule.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRIES.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, it was Ordered, That 1,000 additional copies of the bill (S. 738) to establish the department of commerce and industries, and of Report No. 320, accompanying the same, be printed for the use of the Senate.

CHRISTIAN CRITZMAN.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, the sum of $49.32; and the said Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby directed to apply said amount to the payment of the funeral expenses and the expenses of the last sickness of Christian Critzman, deceased, late messenger to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, including the sum of $100 loaned to him by C. L. Reynolds to meet expenses of his last sickness, and also to provide a suitable headstone to mark his grave in the cemetery at Harrisburg, Pa., at a cost not to exceed $50; the sum herein provided to be in lieu of the usual allowance on the death of an employee of the Senate, and the voucher for payment of the same to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that a resolution of the Senate agreed to February 8, 1900, to print 5,000 extra copies of Senate Document No. 62 be rescinded. I made the motion at the request of some person who desired such copies and had a good many applications for it. The intent of the party was to have Senate Document No. 66 printed. Senate Document No. 62 is a document in three large numbers, and the 5,000 extra copies can not be printed within the statute. So I ask that the resolution may be rescinded, and instead thereof that there be printed for the use of the Senate 5,000 extra copies of Senate Document No. 66.

Mr. ALLISON. What is that document?

Mr. HOAR. It is a document entitled "Affairs in the Philippines."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the resolution by which 5,000 copies of Document No. 62 were ordered to be printed be rescinded.

Mr. ALLISON. The document known as Document No. 62 is an important document also. I have had several requests for that document.

Mr. HOAR. It will cost more, I am told from the Committee on Printing, than the statute limit of $500 without a concurrent resolution, so that the order, I think, should be rescinded, and then there can be a new order sent to the committee if anyone desires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Massachusetts makes the further request that 5,000 extra copies of Senate Document No. 66 be printed.

Mr. HOAR. It is a little document of a few pages.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MONEYS DUE THE CHEROKEE NATION.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was published a document in the third session of the Fifty-third Congress, Executive Document No. 182, which is a statement of the account between the United States and the Cherokee Indians. On inquiring for a copy of it this morning I find that I can not obtain a copy. This is a matter which will be presented to the Senate for its consideration perhaps at this session, and as there was a report made by the Attorney-General adverse to the claim, I ask that the document known as Senate Document No. 16 of the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress and House Executive Document No. 182 of the third session of the Fifty-third Congress may be reprinted, and that both documents be printed together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for a reprint of the two documents which he sends to the desk, and that they be printed in the same volume. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent to have 3,000 extra copies of Senate bill 1770 and the accompanying document, No. 53, printed for the use of the Senate. It will cost $140.50.

Mr. CULLOM. What is the bill about?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The bill provides for the nationalization of the railroads of the United States, and the document is on the same subject.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill provides for the purchase of all the railroads in the country?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WOLCOTT. What is the request?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. To print a bill and document the supply of which has been exhausted. The document ought not to have been printed in the first, but it has been printed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If it ought not to have been printed, the supply ought not to have been exhausted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LIGHTS ON STEAM PILOT VESSELS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine, in the absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] who reported the bill, desires to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 732) relating to lights on steam pilot vessels was passed on the 6th instant, and at the same time that the House be requested to return the said bill to the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Chair lays before the Senate House bill No. 1.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. Question. Will the Chair put the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the request of the Senator?

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Chair to put the question on the pending measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. The pending question in Committee of the Whole is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] was going to speak this morning, or the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. Neither Senator seems to be in the Chamber at this moment, and perhaps we might go on with the Calendar until one of those Senators comes in.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from North Carolina was in his seat a few moments ago and went out. I do not suppose he had any idea that a proposition would be made to disregard the unanimous-consent agreement given some time ago and pass the bill in his absence.

Mr. HOAR. There was not any such proposition made. I had not heard any.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to make such a proposition.

Mr. HOAR. The question is not on the bill; it is on the amendment. There can be no difference on that point.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Of course there will be a number of amendments to be discussed, but I thought the Senator wanted the question put on the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] were here I should call up the Pennsylvania case, and we would see if we could not make some progress in that. I have refrained from doing so because I was told by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that probably all the time would be occupied on the financial bill. Therefore I have not called it up; but I will notify the Senator from Tennessee, so that we may make progress in that case.

Mr. ALDRICH. Two or three Senators were expected to speak this morning. I do not know why they have not appeared.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understood that the Senator from North Carolina was to speak. He did not tell me so himself, but I understood that he proposed to go on this morning. He was in his seat only a few moments ago, and went out of the Senate Chamber. I have sent to find him, but nobody seems to know where he is. I presume he will return to the Chamber in a very few minutes. I have no objection to going on with the Calendar in the meantime.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that we go on with the Calendar in the absence of the Senator from North Carolina.

KATHARINE TAYLOR DODGE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2650) granting an increase of pension to Katherine Taylor Dodge.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, before the name "Taylor," to strike out "Katherine" and insert "Katharine;" in line 7, after the word "captain," to insert "and brevet major," and in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Katharine Taylor Dodge, widow of Charles Dodge, late a captain and brevet major, Company C, Twenty-fourth United States Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she now receives.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the word "junior" be inserted after the name of the soldier, so as to read "Charles Dodge, jr."

The SECRETARY. Insert the word "junior" after the word "Dodge," in line 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Katharine Taylor Dodge."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DEADWOOD, S. DAK.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask leave out of order to make a favorable report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be received.

Mr. RAWLINS. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 16) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Deadwood, in the State of South Dakota, to report it without amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported. It has passed the Senate in its present form in every Congress since 1890.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported. It will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices, in the city of Deadwood, S. Dak., the cost of site and building, including vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed $200,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOG ENTRY OF COLLISIONS.

The bill (H. R. 5066) to amend section 4290 of the Revised Statutes relating to log entry of collisions was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CLAY. A similar bill to the one just laid before the Senate was reported favorably from the Committee on Commerce, and was passed by the Senate yesterday. I ask that the House bill be taken up and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill from the House will be read.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4290 of the Revised Statutes be amended by adding the following:

"Twelfth. In every case of collision in which it is practicable so to do, the master shall, immediately after the occurrence, cause a statement thereof, and of the circumstances under which the same occurred, to be entered in the official log book. Such entry shall be made in the manner prescribed in section 4291, and failure to make such entry shall subject the offender to the penalties prescribed by section 4292."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect sixty days after its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote by which the bill (S. 731) to amend section 4290 of the Revised Statutes, relating to log entry of collisions, was passed will be reconsidered, and the bill will be indefinitely postponed, without objection.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 92) to amend section 864 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to making depositions de bene esse; and

A bill (H. R. 2936) changing place for holding court in the central division of the Indian Territory from Cameron to Poteau, and for other purposes.

The bill (H. R. 969) to amend section 5 of an act to relieve certain appointed and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion, approved August 14, 1888, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 3718) for the preservation of the frigate Constitution was read twice by its title.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the bill lie on the table, because there is a bill already reported on that subject from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask that it go to the Calendar?

Mr. GALLINGER (to Mr. LODGE). Ask for its consideration.

Mr. LODGE. I should be glad to have it considered now, but I do not see on the floor the Senator who reported the Senate bill. Let it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to give notice that on Tuesday morning, immediately after the conclusion of the routine business, I will, as briefly as I can, speak on the pending financial bill. I have arranged with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], who has also given notice that he will speak later in the day on Tuesday.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Has not the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] given notice for that day?

Mr. ALLISON. He will speak on Monday.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

Mr. WARREN. I ask to call up the bill (S. 200) granting to the State of Wyoming 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, I shall insist that we go on with the Calendar, and that we go on with it regularly. That is the proper way, and we will soon reach that bill.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Missouri will insist on that; but I have been unfortunate enough to be near the head of the Calendar with bills important to me and to have to consent to various bills being called up. I desire to say in this connection that if we are to be permitted to call up bills from time to time near the last end of the Calendar, some of us who are near the first end will be compelled to object hereafter. I have no objection to our going to the Calendar now.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the Order of Business?

Mr. WARREN. One hundred and thirty-six.

Mr. COCKRELL. We will reach it in a few minutes if we can go on with the Calendar.

Mr. WARREN. If we can go to the Calendar, certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I insist on going to the Calendar now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consider bills on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will state the first bill on the Calendar.

ESTATE OF JOHN KENNEDY, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 66) for the relief of the heirs of Margaret Kennedy was announced as first on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to the heirs of Margaret Kennedy, the widow and sole executrix of John Kennedy, deceased, $10,476, less any sum heretofore paid her in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the relief of Margaret Kennedy," approved October 19, 1888. The amount herein provided to be paid is to be in full compensation for all claim or demand of Margaret Kennedy as the executrix of John Kennedy, deceased, or of the claim or demand of the heirs or representatives of John Kennedy, by reason of timber, fences, fruit trees, and other property taken and used by the Army of the United States during the late war of the rebellion from the farm of John Kennedy, in the District of Columbia, being the farm on which Fort Sedgwick was located.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE H. WHITE.

The bill (S. 1717) for the relief of George H. White was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to revoke and set aside so much of General Orders, No. 14, Headquarters Department of the Ohio, Cincinnati, Ohio, March 1, 1863, as approved the finding and sentence of the general court-martial dismissing Capt. George H. White, Nineteenth Regiment Michigan Infantry Volunteers, and to issue to White a certificate of discharge as of date March 1, 1863. But no pay, bounty, compensation, or allowance shall accrue to George H. White by virtue of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLINTON F. PULSIFER.

The bill (S. 101) for the relief of Clinton F. Pulsifer was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Clinton F. Pulsifer, of the State of Washington, $276.52, for surveys and resurveys of public lands, section and township lines, in township No. 14 north, range No. 9 west, Willamette base and meridian, duly accepted by the United States, but not heretofore paid for.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONUMENT ON SITE OF FORT PHIL KEARNY MASSACRE.

The bill (S. 194) providing for a monument to mark the site of the Fort Phil Kearny massacre was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to mark the site of the Fort Phil Kearny massacre, that occurred on the 21st of December, 1866, by erecting on the site a monument of rough masonry and an historical tablet. But the site of the proposed monument, of not less than one-fourth of an acre in area, situated upon the most sightly portion of Massacre Hill, shall be donated to the United States. Five hundred dollars is appropriated, to be expended under direction of the Secretary of War for this purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF GEORGE W. LAWRENCE.

The bill (S. 739) for the relief of the estate of George W. Lawrence was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to submit to the Court of Claims the claim of George W. Lawrence for further compensation for the construction of the U. S. monitor Wassuc under his contract with the Navy Department of June 2, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WYOMING STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME.

The bill (S. 200) granting to the State of Wyoming 50,000 acres of land to aid in continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any report with that bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not find that the Committee on Public Lands have made a report. This is a bill which has passed at former sessions of the Senate, and was quite fully discussed on those occasions. I assume that it was for that reason the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], whom I do not now see in his seat, in reporting the bill did not think it necessary to submit a written report. I think the bill indicates very plainly what it is and what is its object.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is an absolute grant of 50,000 acres of land, I understand, to be selected by the State wherever it may choose, and to be disposed of as it may please——

Mr. WARREN. Not at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. To be disposed of in lots of 40 acres or 160 acres, or the whole tract in one body to be sold to one person at 25 cents an acre, or at any other price.

Mr. WARREN. That is not a correct statement, and I know the Senator does not wish to be incorrect; but he is perhaps not aware that the constitution of Wyoming and the laws of Congress protect the matter fully. The land is not to be selected, as the Senator suggests, in one body, nor can it be disposed of in one body to one person. It has to be sold under regulations which I am sure the Senator from Missouri must approve of.

The object is to assist in the support of the State Soldiers and Sailors' Home, and the Senator will doubtless acknowledge, after a moment's reflection, that the old soldiers and sailors who have spent a score of years or more in the high altitudes and dry climate of that region ought not to be taken a long distance and to a different climate and different location. It is impossible to conduct a home for the soldiers who apply for admission to the home of the State of Wyoming with the money already afforded by the General Government and such as the State might reasonably be called upon to appropriate. Therefore it is deemed wise to assist this very worthy object by conveying to the State 50,000 acres of land, which is to be selected under the constitution and regulations of the State, all of which have received the sanction of Congress heretofore.

I will say in that connection that the State of Wyoming had very much less land accredited for its selection from the public domain than had some other States. It has had perhaps but a third to a half as much as has been granted to the States more recently admitted. It has had but a fraction of what the older States—and I presume Missouri was one of them—have received through the swamp-land act, as that act has never been applied to the State of Wyoming and never could be applied. I very much hope there will be no objection to the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. The swamp-land act does not apply to Wyoming because there is no swamp land there.

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. COCKRELL. It would apply if there was any swamp land there.

Mr. WARREN. I do not presume that the Senator from Missouri will insist that all the land selected under the swamp-land act would bear the definition that Webster or any other dictionary maker would give to the word "swamp" as applied to the land selected.

Mr. COCKRELL. I can only say for my own State, in that respect, that land which in 1849 was swamp land, and covered with water a large portion of the time, by reason of cultivation and drainage since that time has become dry land and rarely has water upon it now; but in Missouri, where the land is rolling, it would not be fair to look at it now and say it is not swamp land, though it was swamp land in 1849.

All these State soldiers' homes receive the same gratuity from the General Government. We appropriate for all the State soldiers' homes. Now, here is a proposition to give to one State soldiers' home 50,000 acres of land. This is a gift from the General Government direct to the State, and there are no conditions imposed. The question comes up whether the conditions imposed by the State or the restrictions, or whatever they may be, that have been heretofore imposed by the State, will apply to this grant subsequently made, and made without any reference to those conditions.

I suggest that this bill remain at the head of the Calendar until the data referred to in the former report can be presented to the Senate, and then let the bill be taken up and passed. I ask that it be passed over for the present without losing its place at the head of the Calendar.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, before he objects to the consideration of the bill, I desire to say that the constitution of the State of Wyoming provides that no land can be sold at less than $10 an acre. It is not within human probability that this land will ever be sold. It is not sought to acquire this land for the purposes of sale, but for the revenue that may come from it from the rental of farming and grazing land. There are spots here and there of irrigated land, where people can raise live stock, and they may desire to rent some adjoining grazing land. It is impossible to obtain it from the Government in the way of lease, and the State, after selecting these lands, may lease them for small sums, it is true. But it will help the settler, it will help the State, and, what is more to the point, it will help the Soldiers and Sailors' Home. Our laws and constitution are such that every acre that goes to the State from the United States at any time, now or hereafter, is to be subject to all the rules, one of which I have quoted.

Mr. COCKRELL. On a bill of this importance, when there are millions and millions of acres of such lands that are yet to be disposed of by Congress, is it not right, when we are beginning to make a disposition of them, that we should have the facts stated in a report from the appropriate committee and spread upon the record? That is all I ask.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not object to it so as to place the bill under Rule IX; but I ask that it retain its place on the Calendar. I submit to the Senate that a bill of this importance should be accompanied with a printed report.

Mr. WARREN. I have no quarrel with the Senator from Missouri upon the proposition of passing the bill over without prejudice. But of course it is not within that Senator's power nor mine to force a report upon a bill that comes from a committee of which neither one of us is a member.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over without prejudice.

FORT HAYS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 68) granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing western branches of the Kansas Agricultural College and of the Kansas State Normal School thereon, and for a public park, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

Mr. HARRIS. May I ask the Senator from Missouri to withdraw his objection while I make a statement?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have not made any objection. I have simply asked that the report be read.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator had objected.

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. NELSON January 22, 1900:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 68) granting to the State of Kansas the Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purposes of establishing western branches of the Kansas Agricultural College and the Kansas State Normal School thereon, and for a public park, have carefully considered the bill and respectfully submit the following report, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

A bill identical with this was introduced in the Fifty-fifth Congress, passed the Senate, but did not come up for action in the House. The following is the essential part of the report submitted at that time:

"On the 18th of February, 1895, the legislature of the State of Kansas passed a concurrent resolution requesting the Senators and Representatives in Congress from that State to secure the passage of an act of Congress donating said Fort Hays Military Reservation to the State of Kansas for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned, which resolution is as follows:

"[House concurrent resolution No. 20. By Mr. Schlyer.]

"Whereas the experience of the settlers upon the plains of western Kansas, covering a period of more than twenty years, has demonstrated conclusively that agriculture can not be pursued with profit under existing natural conditions, and that artificial means and methods must be substituted therefor; and

"Whereas the tests and experiments required to determine the fitness of new methods applicable to these higher altitudes and limited rainfall can not be made at the Agricultural College of the State; and

"Whereas the Fort Hays Military Reservation, at an altitude of 2,000 feet above sea level, contains a valuable body of native timber that should be preserved to posterity, and the land of said reservation is admirably adapted for such experiments in agriculture as are required in the premises; and

"Whereas the buildings upon said military reservation, formerly used as residences for officers and their families, barracks for troops, storehouses, etc., are large and commodious, but can not be moved without destruction of their value, but in their position are of great value and could be used with little additional repairs for the purpose of a branch of the State Normal School, and

"Whereas the location of a branch of the State Normal School at this place would be central and convenient for the whole of the north half of the State; and

"Whereas the said military reservation has long since been abandoned by the United States Government as a military post: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Kansas (the senate concurring therein), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby requested to secure the passage of an act of Congress donating the said Fort Hays Military Reservation to the State of Kansas for the following public purposes:

"First. For a western branch of the Kansas Agricultural College.

"Second. For a western branch of the Kansas State Normal Institute.

"Third. For a public park.

"Resolved further, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of Kansas.

"STATE OF KANSAS, Office of the Secretary of State:

"I, W. E. Edwards, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the following and annexed is a true and correct copy of the original instrument of writing filed in my office February 18, 1895.

"In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal. Done at Topeka, Kans., this 19th day of February, 1895.

"[SEAL.] W. E. EDWARDS,
"Secretary of State.

"On Saturday, February 23, 1895, a copy of said concurrent resolution was laid before the Senate by the Vice-President and was duly referred to the Committee on Public Lands, to accompany S. 2799.

"The Fort Hays Military Reservation is situated in what is known as the arid belt of the State of Kansas.

"This post was established in the early history of Kansas for the purpose of furnishing a convenient basis of operations against the Indian tribes of the West and was maintained for many years for that purpose. Excellent buildings were erected thereon for officers' quarters and other army purposes, and are admirably adapted in many respects for the purposes contemplated by this bill. As the Indian tribes were gathered on the reservations in the Indian Territory this military reservation became useless, and several years ago was abandoned as a military station and turned over to the Interior Department, and from thence until the present time it has been of no service to the Government of the United States; upon the contrary, a continued expense and embarrassment.

"In view of the arid condition of the land, it would be difficult to sell it for any reasonable amount. A part of the reservation is covered by an unusual growth of timber for that section of the country, and it is important that this timber be preserved for public-park purposes.

"The State of Kansas has already established a State agricultural college at Manhattan, in Riley County, about 110 miles west of the eastern border of the State. It has also established a State normal institute at Emporia, Lyon County, about 125 miles west of the eastern border of the State.

"The entire length of the State is about 407 miles, and the result is that the people in nearly two-thirds of the State are practically deprived of the benefits and advantages of both of these institutions.

"In view of the arid character of this land and its situation in the western part of the State, about 175 miles west of the present location of the Agricultural College and the State Normal Institute, it would furnish an admirable location for the establishment of branches of these institutions for the benefit of the inhabitants of nearly two-thirds of the State.

"It is and always has been the policy of the Government to encourage and develop institutions of learning of this character, and the establishment of a western branch of the State Agricultural College at this point would be particularly beneficial and appropriate, for the reasons herein stated and more fully set forth in the foregoing concurrent resolution, as it would form a nucleus from which important developments might be expected in determining the agricultural character and value of the arid lands in the western part of Kansas and eastern Colorado; and for all these reasons the committee is of the opinion that the policy contemplated by this bill is a wise and prudent one and will result beneficially not only to the State of Kansas, but to the whole country, and we therefore recommend the passage of this bill."

Mr. ALDRICH. How many acres are there in this proposed grant?

Mr. HARRIS. Seven thousand.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, after the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] shall have concluded his speech, I shall address the Senate briefly on the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

SOLDIERS' HOME AT CHARLESTON, S. C.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yesterday evening while I was absent a bill in which I am interested, being the bill (S. 1018) to establish a branch home of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Castle Pinckney, in Charleston Harbor, South Carolina, or some other eligible site in or near that city, for the use of disabled officers and enlisted men of the Volunteer Army and Navy of the United States, was reached on the Calendar and passed over. I have conferred this morning with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] in regard to that bill, as it was upon his objection it was passed over. I now ask that the bill may be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

THE WILLIAM CRAMP & SONS CO.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 795) for the relief of The William Cramp & Sons Ship and Engine Building Company, of Philadelphia, Pa.; which was passed over yesterday, I think under a misapprehension. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before that bill is read, I should like to ask to be allowed to take up the other bills which were passed over yesterday, including Order of Business No. 111, being the bill (S. 1934) for the relief of the Globe Works, of Boston, Mass., and Order of Business No. 114, being the bill (S. 1744) for the relief of the Atlantic Works, of Boston, Mass. If we are going back, I think all the bills of this character ought to be dealt with together.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to the bills referred to by the Senator being called up after mine shall have been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Nevada?

FUNERAL OF GENERAL LAWTON.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, to enable Senators who desire to do so to attend the funeral of General Lawton, which takes place early this afternoon, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 10, 1900, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 9, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Almighty God, from our heart of hearts, for that long line of illustrious patriots whose daring deeds and heroism made possible our nation and whose lives and characters have sustained it through every crisis. But not so much for the heroism which clusters about their names do we bless Thee, as for the deep and hidden principle within which made them heroes, and which, while it lives, insures the life and perpetuity of our nation.

To-day the hearts of 70,000,000 people look up to Thee in sadness, yet with gratitude, for the noble, the true, the generous, the brave Lawton, typical American soldier, whose life went out by a bullet from the hand of one whom he would have befriended, to whom he offered the same liberty and freedom which he himself enjoyed and loved.

Sleep, comrade, sleep and rest
On the field of the grounded arm,
Where foes no more molest,
Nor sentry's shot alarm.

Your tent of silent green
We'll strew with fragrant flowers;
Yours has the suffering been,
The mem'ry shall be ours.

Hear us, when we commend to Thy care and keeping the broken-hearted widow and the fatherless children. Comfort them by the blessed thought of immortality; in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. WEAVER, for one week, on account of urgent business.
To Mr. RIORDAN, for ten days, on account of important business.
To Mr. HENRY C. SMITH, for two weeks, on account of important business.
To Mr. MCCLEARY, for Monday and Tuesday next.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 284) granting permission and authority to the Orleans levee board to move, without cost to the United States, the existing line of levee in front of the marine-hospital property in New Orleans, La.; when the Speaker signed the same.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 734. An act relating to Cuban vessels.

ASSISTANT CLERK FOR THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I have some reports from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOY] presents a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an assistant clerk for said committee, his salary to be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

With the following amendment:

Amend the resolution so that it will read:

"Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an assistant clerk for said committee during the sessions of the Fifty-sixth Congress, his salary to be paid from the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $6 per day."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I believe we ought to have some explanation of the necessity for this extra clerk. I thought that committee had their usual clerk.

Mr. JOY. They have one clerk; but the chairman has no personal clerk whatever, as no chairman has, unless provided for specially. Still, the Committee on the Judiciary and the chairman of that committee informs our committee and we learn that he requires the assistance of a law clerk. Assistance such as required in that committee can not be obtained for a hundred dollars a month. A man has to be employed who is familiar with the law and legal precedents and prepared to look up legal matters and submit them to the committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] can give you, perhaps, a fuller explanation than I can.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if it is not unusual, if it has been customary, to give two clerks to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. JOY. It has not; but it appears to us, unanimously, that it ought to be done at this time; that the work is of that peculiar nature that a high-priced service is required of the clerical force of that committee. It is the only case in which we have gone beyond what has been done for the committees heretofore. Some of them have been cut off, but it seemed to us that this committee has need of clerical service which it has not had heretofore.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I only want to say, before the gentleman from New York addresses the House, that I do not want to stand in the way of whatever may be necessary for the proper dispatch of business and the transaction of the public business; but it seems to me we are getting along pretty fast, making so many clerks in the last few days, and so many extra offices, that we are now going further than we have ever gone; and now it is proposed to give two clerks to the Committee on the Judiciary. It seems to me that we ought to hold up. I am not inclined to object to the measure if the gentleman from New York can show us that it is necessary.

Mr. RAY of New York. The Speaker of this House——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. JOY. I request the gentleman from New York to make a statement.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is a well-known fact that during the last Congress the Committee on the Judiciary was not properly supplied with clerical assistance; and either the clerk of that Committee, who did the work for the present Speaker of the House, had to divide his salary with an assistant and live in a manner that will hardly comport with the dignity of anyone residing in this District, or else the Speaker had to pay it out of his own pocket, which I think he did. I know that the present chairman of the committee, in order to do the work of the committee and do it properly, is now paying out of his own pocket over $100 every month. We have a large number of bills, affecting every interest and nearly every court all over the United States.

I have letters every day, dozens of them, sometimes more than two dozen, from judges, marshals, and other officials of this Government, making inquiries. It keeps a stenographer busy all the time to answer those communications, and it takes the time of the clerk of the committee to attend to the wants of the members of the committee. Now, I can, as I have in the past, pay out of my own pocket this money for clerk hire, if necessary; but it seems to me that the Government of the United States is able to pay the necessary clerk hire to do the work of this House.

If it were a personal matter, I would not ask it; but we can not with one clerk do the work of that committee, and do it as we ought to do it, do it as gentlemen of the House expect it to be done, do it as the judges and officials of the Government want it done. The clerk is a session clerk only. It does not make a large additional charge; and I want to say to the gentleman that I do know that we need this extra session clerk more than committees asking and receiving similar assistance the other day. The Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Committee on Interstate Commerce were granted assistant clerks, and I know need additional help. I would not ask it for the Judiciary Committee if we did not need it in the public interest.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand whether this clerk is to be a session clerk or to go on the rolls permanently.

Mr. JOY. A session clerk, for the sessions of this Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, from what the gentleman from New York says, it may be necessary, under his administration of the Committee on the Judiciary, to have this extra clerk. The gentleman states that when the present able Speaker of the House was chairman of the committee, last Congress, he needed it; but we all know that he got along without this extra clerk, and I want to commend his example to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and see if he can dispense with the services of this clerk, doing the work as efficiently and as satisfactorily and with the same result as the former chairman of the committee did, he certainly ought not to complain. Now, I do not want to object to the giving of this extra clerk if the gentlemen of the committee need it. But it is not stated that they have any more bills than they had in the last House, or that they have any more business than in the former Congress; and it seems to me that this is simply piling up expenses and making precedents from which we will not escape; because when you give this committee this extra clerk for this session it means for all time to come we have an extra clerk for the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not know about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will ask the gentleman if he remembers any revolution of that kind going backward. It becomes a fixed precedent, which will remain with us forever.

Mr. RAY of New York. If it is absolutely necessary, on account of the great growth of this country of ours, and the growth of its business interests, the gentleman ought to be willing to give this additional help. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that in the Fifty-fourth Congress the Committee on Invalid Pensions had two more clerks than the Fifty-fifth Congress had. To get along with that work in the Fifty-fifth Congress I paid money every month out of my pocket in order to have the necessary work properly done.

Now, I do not think that was right or fair, and I do not believe that any just-minded man in this House wants the chairman of any committee here to pay money out of his own pocket to do the public business. You want it done efficiently and done well.

Mr. RIDGELY. How many clerks has the committee on the roll now?

Mr. RAY of New York. We have one annual clerk.

Mr. RIDGELY. This is simply for a session clerk?

Mr. RAY of New York. It is simply for an assistant clerk for the session.

Mr. RIDGELY. I think it ought to be furnished.

Mr. CAPRON. That is right; the committee ought to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word upon this matter, not with a view of opposing the resolution because I am upon the Committee on Accounts. That committee appointed a subcommittee to take this matter in hand, and they made a thorough investigation of it on yesterday. They had a hearing and various chairmen of committees were before it. I believe they had the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] before them, and it was after the report of the subcommittee, composed of two members of the majority and one member of the minority—I was not on the subcommittee—that the Committee on Accounts voted unanimously to make this report and to give the chairman of the Judiciary Committee an extra clerk at the rate fixed.

Now, one fact that influenced some of us, and I believe the most of us, on the Committee on Accounts in giving the additional clerk to these committees is that, by reason of the law as it now stands on the statute book, the chairmen of the various committees of the House having annual or session clerks have no one to do their individual or private work. In other words, the chairmen of the various committees of the House have no one to do their individual work except the clerks of the committee, and the clerks of the committee being engaged in many cases, especially in the case of large committees, such as the Judiciary and various other committees of the House, are so busy with the work of the committee that the chairmen either have to do their own work or pay out of their own pockets to have it done.

Mr. RAY of New York. That is true.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is one of the main reasons that influenced the committee, or at least influenced me, to vote for this resolution. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to say that it is absolutely necessary to have this additional clerk in order to do the work of the committee satisfactorily and to relieve the chairman of that committee of the necessity of paying out of his own pocket money for work to be done for the committee. I think the gentleman ought to have this relief. The resolution was unanimously reported from the committee.

Mr. RAY of New York. I thank the gentleman from Georgia. I think he has presented the matter in a stronger light than I could myself.

The amendment to the resolution was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JOY, a motion to reconsider the vote last passed was laid on the table.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. JOY, from the Committee on Accounts, offered the following resolution, which was read by the Clerk:

Resolved, That the resolution adopted February 7, 1900, which provides that the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee be authorized to appoint an assistant clerk for the Committee on Military Affairs, be amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That the appointment of an assistant clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs for the sessions of the Fifty-sixth Congress is hereby authorized, said clerk to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $6 per day.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what is the necessity for this amendment.

Mr. JOY. Through an oversight of the reading clerk the other day three resolutions were improperly read, so that the clerks can not be paid. The resolutions did not provide in the body of the resolution that clerks should be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. These resolutions are only to correct that error, so that payment can be made.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JOY, from the Committee on Accounts, also offered the following resolution; which was read by the Clerk:

Resolved, That the resolution adopted February 7, 1900, providing for the appointment of an assistant clerk to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, be amended so as to read as follows:

"Resolved, That the appointment of an assistant clerk to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for the sessions of the Fifty-sixth Congress is hereby authorized, said clerk to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $6 per day."

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JOY, from the Committee on Accounts, also offered the following resolution; which was read by the Clerk:

Resolved, That the resolution adopted February 7, 1900, providing for the appointment of an assistant clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs, be amended so as to read as follows:

"Resolved, That the appointment of an assistant clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs for the sessions of the Fifty-sixth Congress is hereby authorized, said clerk to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $6 per day."

The resolution was agreed to.

F. W. TURPIN, JR.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted a privileged report from that committee, reporting back House resolution No. 121 with the recommendation that it do pass.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to F. W. Turpin, jr., the sum of $73.22, being the amount due him as the clerk of Hon. Samuel T. Baird, late Representative-elect from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana, from April 1 to April 22, 1899.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH also reported back favorably from the Committee on Accounts the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House is hereby authorized to continue the employment of John Tate as page in the press gallery of the House during the sessions of the Fifty-sixth Congress, at the rate of $75 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I move to reconsider the two votes last taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER, RECESS, ETC.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. SIMS. Is this motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think not.

Mr. SIMS. I would like, at any rate, to ask a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, this is private-bill day. We have not yet had a single day this session for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand that this motion is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not quite clear upon the point.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why should we now take a recess? If we are going to adjourn over, why not adjourn over? Last Friday we did not succeed in having the Private Calendar considered. Two weeks ago and three weeks ago the case was the same.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the Chair hold that this motion is debatable or not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not ruled on the subject. He was availing himself of the opportunity to hear the interchange of views between the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why not go on now with the Private Calendar or adjourn over? I think we ought to have to-day for the Private Calendar. We have not had a Private Calendar day up to the present time this session.

Mr. SIMS. I will say very frankly to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], if I may be permitted to do so——

The SPEAKER. Without having it understood as a precedent (for the Chair is not clear on the point), the Chair will be glad to hear what gentlemen may desire to say on the subject of taking a recess.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the Committee on War Claims. That committee has been in session every week since the committee was organized. We have been engaged in considering bills before that committee, a number of which have been reported. It seems they are not to be considered by the House. If this kind of thing is to go on, I do not see the use of having such a committee or of its holding meetings. If the bills reported by that committee are such as ought not to be passed, let the House act on them and vote them down; on the other hand, if they ought to be passed, let them have the same consideration as the other bills.

Mr. Speaker, this is the third month of the present session, and we have not yet had a single private bill day under the rules. I certainly think we are entitled to have the business on the Private Calendar considered. Pension bills and bills to remove the charge of desertion and to correct military records have under the rules exclusive right of way at the Friday evening sessions. I should like to know, then, why we should take a recess, giving preference to that class of private bills and cutting out this other class. I think we ought to devote to-day to the Private Calendar or else not have a night session. I am in favor of both.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order at this time, for the purpose of saving discussion, to ask unanimous consent that we devote two hours and a half of to-day's session to pension business in lieu of having a night session?

Mr. SIMS. But what we desire is consideration of such private bills on the Calendar as are in order during to-day's session.

Mr. MERCER. Would the gentleman object to the proposition I have suggested?

Mr. SIMS. I want to have the Private Calendar taken up to-day and proceeded with in its regular order.

Mr. MERCER. In preference to pension legislation?

Mr. SIMS. We can give to-morrow to pension business. The fact of our adjourning over until Monday shows that we have a day to spare. If private bills, in order at the day sessions on Fridays, are not to be acted on by the House, what is the use of our going through the farce of having a committee consider and report them?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I made this motion——

Mr. GIBSON. I ask the gentleman from New York whether we can not agree to adjourn now and let next Tuesday be devoted to the business of the Private Calendar, instead of to-day.

Mr. SIMS. Something of that kind would suit us.

Mr. PAYNE. I can not consent to the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee. I made my motion for two reasons. One was that the chairman of the Committee on War Claims is not here to-day; I understand he has been called out of town. The other reason was that a great many gentlemen have spoken to me, saying they would like to attend General Lawton's funeral this afternoon. I thought from these expressions that we should be without a quorum this afternoon, so I made this motion while gentlemen were still here, so that we might have an expression of the House upon it.

Mr. Speaker, if necessary I move the previous question.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I should like to say a word on the point of order—nothing else.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] demands the previous question.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I only want to speak on the point of order. I understood the point of order was made that the motion was not debatable.

The SPEAKER. We have passed that point. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE) there were—ayes 104, noes 69.

Accordingly the previous question was ordered.

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Speaker, out of respect for the occasion, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. LOUD, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. PAYNE demanded a division.

Pending the division,

Mr. HILL demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, ought they not to take the other side before demanding the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the yeas and nays is in order at any time pending a division.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The calling of the roll has been ordered.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to know whether, if this motion is carried, it does away with the motion previously passed to take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. PAYNE. That motion was not passed.

The SPEAKER. That motion was not passed. If this motion prevails, the House will adjourn until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 84, nays 152, answered "present" 6, not voting 112; as follows:

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—WISE AGAINST YOUNG.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have been physically unable to prepare the views of the minority in the contested-election case of Wise against Young. I was confined to my bed two days this week; and I ask the House to give me until Tuesday next to present my views, and I will ask no further extension of time. I am unable to do it at this time. If I were able, I would not make the request of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to have the time extended in which to present the views of the minority in the contested-election case of Wise against Young until Tuesday next. Is there objection?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I have just consented to an extension until Monday next. Does the gentleman now ask another day?

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I would ask that the time be extended until Tuesday next. I do not know whether I will be able to complete it by Monday.

Mr. WEEKS. I consent to that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, upon which the previous question has been ordered, to take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SIMS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 107, noes 15.

Mr. SIMS. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Eleven gentlemen in the affirmative—not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused; the ayes have it, and the House stands in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House was declared in recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m., by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the special rule under which the House is proceeding this evening.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the special rule just read.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes none.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Present.

Mr. TALBERT. The point I made was that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has repeated the gentleman's point to the House.

Mr. SULLOWAY rose.

Mr. TALBERT. A point of order.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. TALBERT. It is that the Speaker misunderstood me. The point I made was that there is no quorum present, and I prefer it should be that way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. TALBERT. I make the point of order that that is out of order without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays can be ordered.

Mr. TALBERT. The only motion in order is to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs the gentleman's pardon. It is in order to demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. TALBERT. I grant it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no question as to no quorum. It does not appear that there is no quorum. No quorum voted, but that is as far as we have gone, and the yeas and nays are demanded.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is perfectly in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state the motion. The motion is that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 169, nays 0, answered "present" 17, not voting 168; as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I find my friend from Ohio, Mr. PHILLIPS, is not present, and I voted not remembering that I was paired with him. I wish to withdraw my vote and be marked "present."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The yeas are 169, the nays none, present 15. A quorum is present. The yeas have it, and the House votes to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, with Mr. HEPBURN in the chair, for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar under clause 2 of Rule XXVI, and the Clerk will read the first bill.

JAMES M. KERCHEVAL.

The first business in order was the bill (H. R. 309) granting a pension to James M. Kercheval.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll of the United States of America the name of James M. Kercheval, late assistant surgeon, United States Army, and pay him a pension at the rate of $17 per month from the 4th day of May, 1895.

The amendments reported by the committee were read and agreed to, as follows:

Amend, in line 6, by adding the word "acting," so as to read "acting assistant surgeon;" and amend the rate of pension, in line 7, from $17 to $12 per month; and strike out, in lines 7 and 8, the words "from the 4th day of May, 1895."

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

[At various points in the foregoing proceedings, after the reading of the amendments, Mr. TALBERT addressed the Chair, but was not recognized.]

WILLIAM W. WHARTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3072) to increase the pension of William W. Wharton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William W. Wharton, of Erie, Pa., late member of Company I, Eighty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Infantry, and pay him a pension of $24 per month in lieu of the pension of $17 he is now receiving.

[Mr. TALBERT, during the reading of the bill, addressed the Chair, but was not recognized.]

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 8, after the word "pension," add the words, "at the rate." Also, amend the title of the bill so that it will read as follows: "Granting an increase of pension to William W. Wharton."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few remarks upon this bill. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that I have a right to appear on this floor and to be heard. It is an unheard-of thing, when a member gets up to address the Chair, and when the Chair sees him, for the Chair to deliberately refuse to listen to him. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that I have rights, and I am here to demand them. I want to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to speak to this bill. I want to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is out of order, and will take his seat.

Mr. TALBERT. "The gentleman from South Carolina" is not out of order. The Chair is out of order—has acted in an arbitrary and tyrannical manner. I resent it; and I will stand by what I say. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will take my seat when I get ready.

The CHAIRMAN (having put the question on agreeing to the amendments). In the opinion of the Chair the ayes have it, and the amendments are agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. I demand a division.

Mr. TALBERT. I desire to make a few remarks.

Mr. SIMS. I demanded a division; and I demanded it in time.

The Chair proceeded to count the committee by a rising vote.

Mr. TALBERT (during the division). Mr. Chairman, I desire to make some remarks on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order in speaking while the House is dividing. He will please take his seat.

The result of the vote being announced, there were—ayes 104, noes none.

So the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I desire now to address the committee on the bill now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing abrupt to say about this bill or about yourself or about any gentleman on this side or the other side. I accept the presence of a quorum here tonight, Mr. Chairman, as a complete vindication of my action at the last Friday night session.

What I have done and all that I have said on this subject have been said and done without the slightest feeling on my part against the men who fought on the Northern side in the war between the North and the South. There is no feeling of hostility in my heart toward the living or dead soldier in that terrible conflict.

There is no political or sectional prejudice in my heart that will prevent my doing the Northern soldiers full and complete justice in voting pensions to those who are honorably entitled to the Government's consideration.

My opposition, Mr. Chairman, to the loose, reckless, unconstitutional method of passing pension bills at these Friday night sessions is based solely on this flagrantly objectionable method of legislation.

Why not give the Pension Committee a day session in each week, according to the distribution of time allotted to the District of Columbia and other special matters? We have a District of Columbia day, a suspension day, a private-bill day; then why not, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the friends of the soldier, have a soldier day? That would be the orderly way of doing business. It is not an uncommon thing for the House to adjourn over Saturday. Why not give that day to the Pension Committee, with the distinct understanding that a quorum will be necessary as in other legislation?

I perfectly understand, Mr. Chairman, that my position in this matter may be misunderstood, and possibly may be used to influence some old soldier to keep on voting for the old flag and increased appropriations. I know, too, sir, that it is almost treason for a Southern Representative, especially one who fought on the Southern side in the late war in vindication of his constitutional right to local self-government. But, sir, I do not care one straw about such influences.

I would not see the Democratic party triumph at the cost of such an abuse to the honest, hard-working taxpayers of the country. I am not raising a false alarm, Mr. Chairman, in this matter. I ask the Clerk to read the extract from the Washington Post, February 7, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

DELUGE OF PENSION BILLS—IF ALL OF THEM WERE ENACTED THEY WOULD BANKRUPT THE GOVERNMENT.

Senator GALLINGER, chairman of the Senate Committee on Pensions, says that never before during his term of public service has there been such a deluge of general pension bills designed to take large sums of money out of the Treasury as now. He gives it as his opinion that if all the bills now before his committee should be enacted into law, they would absolutely bankrupt the finances of the Government.

The latest scheme that is being pressed upon the committee is to wipe out the pension rolls by paying all pensions in a lump sum, according to a table based upon the expectation of life, as estimated by the American life insurance companies. The advocates of this scheme have probably not taken the trouble to figure out the amount that would be called for, but it is safe to assume that it would run into the billions. Fortunately, there is no danger of a measure of that kind receiving serious consideration, but the mere suggestion of it shows the reckless views that some people hold in regard to pension matters.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have from the distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Pensions the positive statement that the pension bills now pending in this Congress alone would bankrupt the Government. That is in addition to the regular budget of $150,000,000 a year.

And who can say with any certainty that it will not be $200,000,000 two years hence? It is the practice, Mr. Chairman, to call attention to the fact that our annual pension expenditures exceed by ninety millions the pension rolls of England, Germany, and France combined.

I do not care anything about such comparisons. If our expenditures were two hundred millions in excess, it would make no difference. That is not the question. The enormous pension expenditure in this country is a stupendous abuse, a gigantic steal, an appalling extravagance that disgraces the Government and threatens it with bankruptcy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in conclusion, that my record and my votes here show that I have always voted to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of pension bills. I so voted to-night. It has been asserted, I believe, by yourself, Mr. Chairman, and by others here that those who are in the majority in this House are responsible for legislation.

And if I mistake not the gentleman who now occupies the chair, and who does not want anybody to talk who does not talk the way he wants them to talk, has himself said he did not believe that any Democrat ought to be on the Committee on Rules. In fact, gentlemen on the other side have asserted that the Republican party is per se the party of this country. I submit, if such is the case, that they should bring a quorum here and pass legislation and be responsible for it.

Now, I want to say that I think the gentleman occupying the chair owes an apology to the House for trying to stifle discussion. I submit that gentlemen who rise here and seek to be recognized in the regular parliamentary way are entitled to recognition. I say that the present occupant of the chair, in the action which he took toward myself, has acted to-night in a way unbecoming the Chairman of a great legislative body. His action was revolutionary and subversive of right and justice. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SARAH POTTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5229) granting a pension to Sarah Potter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Sarah Potter, permanently helpless daughter of Andrew Potter, deceased, late of Company K, Eighth Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Line 8, after the word "pension," insert the words "at the rate."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of saying anything to wound the feelings of any member of this House, and what I say will apply to one side of the House as well as to the other. I would not say it if I did not think it was my duty to say it. I take it that the committees of this House, charged with legislation and their duties respecting it, are each as important in the eyes of the country as the other. One certainly has as many rights as the other, and the bills reported from the respective committees certainly ought to be treated alike.

Now, it does not bind members to vote for a bill because they vote for its consideration. I have never yet voted against going into Committee of the Whole to consider private pension bills. I never yet raised the point of no quorum. I never yet voted against one of these bills that I thought ought to be passed, and I never intend to. But justice is one thing and generosity is another, and as between justice and generosity, if we must lean either way, I would say lean in the direction of justice. It is certainly more proper, it is certainly right, to pay debts before you bestow favors.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was placed on the Committee on War Claims. That committee does not have to deal alone with claims growing out of the war of the rebellion. Claims growing out of the recent war have come before that committee, and important general legislation comes before that committee. The first eighteen bills on this Private Calendar are from that committee. The nineteenth bill is a pension bill. Every bill on that Calendar is a private bill, and one stands just as high under the rules of this House as another.

Now, there has been no crowding for time at this session. It is not worth while to say that we have not had plenty of time to consider these bills, for we have had it. No longer ago than yesterday the committees were called. Every committee in this House was called, and many chairmen of those committees sat dumb when their committees were called, and that was the case with the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions no longer ago than yesterday. When did the House adjourn yesterday? At 1 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.

Every bill on this Calendar granting a pension could have been considered yesterday. Do not let it go forth to the country, to try to humbug and bamboozle the old soldier, that anybody is trying to keep him from having his bills considered. I lay the responsibility where it belongs. Every committee was called yesterday. It looks very much as if there is an effort to prevent a single bill being considered in this Congress which is reported from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. RAY of New York. May I ask my friend a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly; I always yield, even without a request to do so.

Mr. RAY of New York. I believe I am correct in the statement, and if I am not the gentleman who is addressing the House or some other gentleman will correct me. Under the call of committees, as I understand it, it would not have been in order to have taken up a pension bill or a war-claim bill.

Mr. SIMS. Why was the committee called?

Mr. RAY of New York. Am I correct in my supposition?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is correct.

Mr. RAY of New York. Therefore I do not think that the criticism of the gentleman from Tennessee is well founded.

Mr. SIMS. Why was the committee called? I will let the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] answer that.

Mr. RAY of New York. The committee was called for the purpose of allowing the consideration of bills on the House Calendar that did not carry any charge against the Government. If there were any such public bills reported from that committee, they could have been considered. Now, that being so, the criticism of the gentleman is unfounded.

Mr. SIMS. I do not want to make a criticism that is not properly founded; but on any day when this House has adjourned over, you could, by unanimous consent, have taken up these pension bills, and we have adjourned over several times for two days. What have we to do to-morrow? Nothing on earth.

Now, you can not humbug the old soldier as long as we can tell the facts about it. Every one of these bills could have been considered and passed. I do not ask you to take them up out of order, but here is what I do complain of. This is the third month of this session, and this is the second Friday evening session of this month, and we have not had a single private bill considered on the Private Calendar of this House.

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. SIMS. On Friday?

Mr. RAY of New York. I think a week ago to-day there was a private bill. It was for a corporation, but I think it was a war-claim bill that was up for discussion, and I know I discussed it for some time, and I had the floor when the committee rose and will be entitled to it when we go into the consideration of that business again.

Mr. SIMS. Did the House go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

Mr. RAY of New York. It was on one of these private claims.

Mr. SIMS. Taken up by unanimous consent, was it not?

Mr. RAY of New York. No; I remember distinctly now that we did go into the committee.

Mr. SIMS. It was by unanimous consent, for the consideration of that bill, and not on the Calendar generally, as you are here to-night.

Mr. CURTIS. The Calendar shows that there was unfinished business.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the interruption?

Mr. SIMS. Why, certainly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CURTIS. The Calendar shows that there is unfinished business upon it, for it states that the bill H. R. 6909 is "pending as unfinished business in the Committee of the Whole, Friday, January 26, 1900."

Mr. SIMS. Well, now, I am coming to a point that I know there can be no question about. I may be in error about the rules of the House, but to-day when you voted to take a recess, a few minutes after 1 o'clock, until to-night, what was the intention of the vote except to prevent the consideration of this Private Calendar? Now, will any gentleman answer, if he can? It was incidentally thrown out that it was to go to the Lawton funeral. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON], got up and asked that next Tuesday be set apart, then, in place of to-day, for the consideration of such bills as would have been in order to-day, and it was objected to on that side. When the facts are before the people of this country, they know whether they are being treated fairly or not.

Now, look at these pension bills. Why, we passed 600 private pension bills in the Fifty-fifth Congress, if I am not mistaken.

Every one of the 71 pension bills on the Calendar here to-night are new bills; but how is it with the bills reported by the Committee on War Claims? I will say that on this Calendar there are 37 war-claim bills, 15 bills from the Committee on Claims, 71 from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and 1 from the Committee on Pensions.

Now, my friends—and I treat you as such; we grow hot in discussion, but it only goes to that extent—what are these 37 war-claim bills? Many of them have been before this House twenty or twenty-five years, have been reported favorably in every Congress, many of them having passed both Houses of Congress, and yet we can not get the poor favor of a consideration of those bills.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now may I ask you a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. In the Fifty-fifth Congress, while it is true that there passed this House and were enacted into law more than 650 private pension bills, those bills in all made a charge on the Treasury of only a little over $100,000 per annum, and during the Fifty-fifth Congress, to my personal knowledge, there were war claims passed this House that carried more than five times that amount of money.

A MEMBER. More than ten times that much.

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; there was one bill that carried over $300,000.

Mr. GROSVENOR. A Tennessee bill, too.

Mr. RAY of New York. I spoke from my personal knowledge. Now, while I have every consideration and respect for my friend, I think he is making a mistake to-night when he charges this House with having adjourned to-day for the purpose of cutting off the consideration of war claims. Here was the funeral, in the capital city of this great nation, of one of the greatest generals of modern times, being held almost beneath the Dome of this Capitol. It was perfectly right and just and proper for the representatives of the people here—both political parties—to leave the work of this House for a few hours and attend the obsequies of that great hero. Will you complain of that? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. Now, let me answer that question. When, in the history of this country, did the House on the death of a great hero refuse to adjourn? [Applause on the Democratic side.] You refused to adjourn. We gave you an opportunity to adjourn, out of respect to the memory of General Lawton, and upon the yeas and nays you voted it down [renewed applause on the Democratic side], and you stuffed a recess down our throats and brought us here to-night for the purpose of passing private pension bills. Talk about honoring a hero! You may honor heroes when to do so does not get in the way of taking money out of the Treasury.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. We wanted an adjournment, and we could not get it, and the yeas and nays show it.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman stated that these war claims were debts owed by the Government. Do I understand him to say that the Government owes no debt to the old soldiers?

Mr. SIMS. I will answer that question; there is no trouble about that. There is no debt owed by this Government to any old or any young soldier; but a feeling of gratitude and generosity says, "Provide for them," and we are willing to do it, and have done it. Over $2,400,000,000 have been paid to the old soldier, and the increase still goes on. We have got soldiers now to pension; and I think we can talk about it without being sectional—they are from the South, the North, the East, and the West, knocking at the door of Congress, and I say, do not close it, but give them an opportunity to be heard, and give them such relief as they are justly entitled to. And I want to say further to the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SIMS. I want to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. This discussion is not germane to the question. We can get through these bills in the time that this speech has taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman's remarks are not germane. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee to this bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I was asked a question by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I want to answer that question. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must continue his remarks in order.

Mr. SIMS. Has any question been asked in order?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be out of order; but if this House does not want to hear the naked truth, make your points of order and stick to them; I have no favor to ask from this House.

A MEMBER. Your side makes the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. This side makes it, but not this side of the pension question. If there is any gentleman wilder on the subject of pensions than the gentleman from Ohio I have not made his acquaintance.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I accept that as a compliment.

Mr. SIMS. I do not say that to disparage the gentleman; for he takes pride in it.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I do.

Mr. SIMS. But there are general laws that grant pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must insist that the gentleman confine himself to the question before the committee.

Mr. SIMS. Will the Chair kindly inform me what it is?

The CHAIRMAN. It is to amend the bill granting a pension to Sarah Potter, by inserting the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. SIMS. Well, then, I would like to hear the report read, Mr. Chairman, in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5229) granting a pension of $12 per month to Sarah Potter, having carefully considered the facts in the case, respectfully report that a bill for the relief of the beneficiary was favorably reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Fifty-third Congress and passed the House December 17, 1894; that it went to the Senate, but no action seems to have been taken by that body. It was again favorably reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Your committee adopt the accompanying reports (House Reports Nos. 1207 and 2882 of the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses) as their own, and recommend the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 1207, Fifty-third Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 3716) granting a pension to Sarah Potter, and submit the following report:

The petitioner is the daughter of Andrew Potter, who served in Company K, Eighth Michigan Cavalry, from February 26, 1863, to September 5, 1865; he was pensioned at $14 per month on account of disease of lungs, and died August 15, 1892, as shown by the records of the Pension Bureau.

Dr. L. E. Knapp, of Fenton, Mich., certifies that he has known Sarah Potter for fifteen years, and has rated her for chronic granular inflammation of the eyelids resulting in numerous ulcers, and that she has suffered from this trouble for twenty-five years, and it has rendered her sight very poor.

She suffers also from spinal trouble, which causes the tendons of the lower limbs to contract, obliging her to walk on her toes, rendering walking difficult. Her mind is also weak and childlike; she has no judgment, is easily excited, and then becomes hysterical, and is very hard to control.

Edwin M. Hovey, supervisor of the township of Fenton, Flint, Mich., states that the soldier was entirely dependent on his pension, and at his death the daughter became nearly a town charge, and that the writer, as supervisor, has supplied her with a living for the past year.

Dr. Edmund Bachman, town physician, Fulton, Mich., states that the soldier died leaving no property and that the daughter is incompetent, imbecile, and unable to support herself.

The War Department records show the soldier to have enlisted February 26, 1863; absent without leave from May 15 to August 25, 1863; discharged September 5, 1863, at Detroit, Mich., on surgeon's certificate of disability on account of broken-down constitution and old age, being then 56 years old.

Franklin Potter, of Trenton, Mich., testifies that the soldier died August 15, 1892, leaving no widow surviving him. Betsey Potter, the mother of the petitioner, died in the year 1862. The petitioner was born forty-nine years ago, exact date not known.

Mr. SIMS. From what I gather from that report this seems to be a very good bill, and I expect it ought to pass. All good bills ought to pass, and all good bills ought to have an opportunity for consideration by this House, from whatever committee they come. But inasmuch, Mr. Chairman, as I have been made to feel very sad by the remarks on the death of the great and distinguished soldier, General Lawton, I want now to move to adjourn out of respect to General Lawton.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's motion is out of order. The committee can not adjourn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. SIMS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SIMS. My request really was meant to be, not to adjourn, but that the committee rise, so that the House might adjourn, out of respect to the memory of General Lawton. Now, is that in order? If it is, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of adjourning, out of respect to the memory of General Lawton.

The question was taken on the motion that the committee rise, and it was rejected.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY GEESEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4416) to increase the pension of Henry Geesen.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Geesen, late a private in Company E, Second Pennsylvania Infantry, Mexican war volunteers, and late private in Company A, Fourteenth Illinois Cavalry, in the late war of the rebellion, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the report read.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. MINOR), as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4416) to increase the pension of Henry Geesen, submit the following report:

Henry Geesen, the soldier named in the bill, and now 77 years of age, is shown by the records of the War Department to have served in the war with Mexico as a private in Company E, Second Pennsylvania Volunteers, from December 24, 1846, to July 14, 1848, when he was mustered out; to have again enlisted as a corporal in Company A, Fourteenth Illinois Cavalry, on September 11, 1862; to have been transferred to Company B, Seventeenth Veteran Reserve Corps, July 5, 1863, by reason of lame back, and to have been mustered out July 6, 1865.

The medical records of the War Department show that the soldier, while a member of Company A, Fourteenth Illinois Cavalry, was in the general hospital from April 9, 1863, to July 20, 1863, under treatment for chronic diarrhea and rheumatism.

The files of the Pension Bureau show that the soldier applied for a pension June 1, 1885, on account of malarial poisoning and rheumatism, alleged to have been contracted in March, 1863, while serving in Kentucky, and upon due proof that he contracted rheumatism in the service and line of duty and that such disability had continued to exist ever since his discharge from the service he was pensioned in April, 1886, for such disease at $2 per month, commencing from the date of the filing of his application, and the claim on account of malarial poisoning was rejected upon the ground that a pensionable disability from the same did not exist.

In February, 1887, this rating of $2 per month was increased to $4 per month from January 5, 1887, and in June, 1887, his name was dropped from the roll by reason of the allowance of his claim as a survivor of the Mexican war, at $8 per month, from January 29, 1887, and this last allowance was based upon his service of more than sixty days in the war with Mexico and being over 62 years of age.

On July 5, 1890, the pensioner applied for a pension under the act of June 27, 1890, and was pensioned under that law, in lieu of the pension which he formerly received under the Mexican war survivors' act, at the maximum rating, $12 per month, from July 5, 1890, on account of total inability to earn a support by manual labor, due to disability arising from rheumatism and senility, and he is now in receipt of said pension.

The last medical examination in the case, made February 24, 1892, showed that the pensioner had evidence of general chronic rheumatism, most all of the joints of the body being tender on pressure, and there being marked limited motion and crepitus on movement, the shoulder joints being much more affected than others, for which disability the board rated him at $4. The board also found disease of chest, for which they rated $8, and added that while the man was well nourished bodily (in 1892) he was an infirm and helpless old man.

The disease of the chest, according to the pensioner's statement, was incurred after the war of the rebellion. Evidence in the case further shows that the pensioner does not own any real or personal property, and depends upon the small pension and what garden stuff he can raise with the aid of his wife.

There has been filed with the committee the affidavit of Dr. W. T. Griffith, of Washington, Ill., to the effect that for the last four years the pensioner has been greatly troubled with constipation of the bowels and vertigo, the latter being so severe at times that he would fall on the sidewalk and would have to be helped to his home; that on May 15, 1899, he was stricken with hemiplegia of the right side and laid in a half-conscious condition for several days; that in about six weeks he recovered consciousness and the use of his right side sufficiently to sit up with assistance; that he is now (November 22, 1899) unable to dress himself, and most of the time has to be fed.

With assistance he can sit up and walk around the room and yard a little, but his age and present physical condition render his disabilities permanent, and will require a constant attendant for the remainder of his life.

The assessor of the township of Washington, Ill., also testified that no property, real or personal, had been assessed to the pensioner in 1898 and 1899; and two residents of that town also testified to the pensioner's destitution and dependence of himself and wife upon the sympathy and aid of friends for a place to protect them and to give them shelter from the summer's heat and the winter's cold.

In view of these services rendered by this soldier in two wars, and considering his present physical condition and utter destitution, the committee report the bill favorably, after amending the same, in line 4, by adding, after the word "roll," the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws." Also, further amend the bill by striking out the words "thirty dollars," in line 8, and inserting in place thereof the words "twenty-four dollars," and when so amended recommend its passage.

The amendments proposed by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SUSAN GARRISON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2749) granting a pension to Susan Garrison.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susan Garrison, widow of Goldsbury Garrison, deceased, late of Company C, Eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry.

With the following amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

After the word "Cavalry," in the eighth line thereof, add the words: "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month;" and when so amended recommend its passage."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to persist in talking out of order, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] asked a question and I want to reply to it; not extensively. I do not want to annoy the House.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee, be given five minutes to reply to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that his colleague be given five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think I am limited to five minutes; the only question is whether I am talking out of order. The gentleman from New York asked if the last House did not pass a great number of war-claim bills. The last House did pass what was called the omnibus bill, which carried a great number of war claims, which were the verdicts or findings of the Court of Claims—an accumulation of many years. Now, to make such a statement as was made by the gentleman from New York is misleading to the country, unless the facts are given. That omnibus bill combines all the findings of the Court of Claims up to that time, and in the Senate was amended by putting on a large amount of the French spoliation claims, which were not war claims in the sense that we now speak of them.

Mr. RAY of New York. You will admit that it passed many other private claims besides—the Methodist Book claim, for instance?

Mr. SIMS. I am coming to that. That disposes of the omnibus bill—that it is the findings of the court and judgments accumulated for many years. The gentleman from New York knows very well that no claims of this character had been passed for many years. Private pension bills are passed every session and do not go over and accumulate and pile up and have to pass put into an omnibus bill. When a war claim is paid, that is the end of it, while a pension continues during the life of the pensioner.

Now, as to the Methodist Publishing House claim, that was passed by the last Congress. There was behind that bill a large number of sympathizers with the church all over the United States. Why the bill never passed before I do not know, but it seems that it took the steam of a distinguished and expert lobbyist to get it through.

But that is neither here nor there. What is the use of having a committee to report these bills and bring them in here and never consider them? I do not ask you to vote for them if you do not think you ought to. If they are not just and right after they are considered, then vote them down. I never voted yet against the consideration of any bill. It is certainly a poor privilege to have a bill considered. It is well known that as a rule we can not get recognition to pass bills by unanimous consent—that the door is always barred to legislation of this kind.

If the bills are wrong, vote them down, but do not deprive us of the day set apart for their exclusive consideration. We only ask for fairness and justice; we ask you gentlemen on the other side that when the next private bill day comes to stand up like men and vote for us to have it, and then filibuster or do anything you want to on the passage of the bill. That is your right; but do not shut the door to consideration. I do not fight pension bills out of spite, but I think all private bills ought to stand on the same bottom.

I do not ask you to vote for any war claim that you think you ought not to, but do not put us off from Friday to Friday and from day to day and year to year. Now, there are not many of these bills. I do not think there will be many of them reported, but 18 of the first bills on the Calendar are of that character, and in all justice we are entitled to consideration of those bills upon this Calendar. I do not want to misrepresent anything or give any false impression about this matter. I simply want justice to one committee of this House as well as to another.

The amendments proposed by the committee were agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

EMMA M. KITT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 438) granting a pension to Emma M. Kitt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Emma M. Kitt, widow of John B. Kitt, of Cooley's Independent Battery, Illinois Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $8 a month.

The amendments reported by the committee were read and agreed to, as follows:

Insert in line 4, after the word "roll," the following: "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pensions laws."

In line 6 strike out the word "Volunteers" and insert in place thereof the words "Light Artillery."

And when so amended recommend the passage of the bill, believing that the beneficiary is entitled to such relief, as she was the wife of the soldier before, during, and since the war, and is now in a dependent condition.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELIZABETH R. HOLT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2391) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. Holt.

Holt, widow of Wesley E. Holt, late private of Company C, First New Hampshire Heavy Artillery Volunteers, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, and agreed to, as follows:

In line 8 strike out the words "of twelve" and insert in place thereof the words "at the rate of eight," and that when so amended the passage of the bill is recommended.

[Mr. DRIGGS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

HARVEY GRANT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1885) to pension Harvey Grant.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions of the pension laws, the name of Harvey Grant, late of Company B, First Regiment of East Tennessee National Guards.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, and agreed to, as follows:

In line 5, after the word "provisions," insert "and limitations;" also add to the bill, in line 7, after the word "Guards," the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 a month."

Amend title so as to read: "Granting a pension to Harvey Grant," and when so amended recommend its passage.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MELVINA BOTTLES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3067) granting a pension to Melvina Bottles.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll of the United States the name of Melvina Bottles, widow of William J. Bottles, late of Company E, Twenty-first Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of the pension which she now receives.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, and agreed to, as follows:

Strike out in lines 4 and 5 the words "of the United States."

After the word "roll," in line 4, insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Melvina Bottles."

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SUSAN M. BUTTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3260) granting a pension to Mrs. S. M. Button.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. S. M. Button, widow of Joseph Milliken, late sergeant, Company C, One hundred and forty-first Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

In the sixth line strike out "Mrs. S. M." and insert in place thereof "Susan M."

Also amend title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Susan M. Button."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CAPT. JOHN F. NELSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3071) to increase the pension of Capt. John F. Nelson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Capt. John F. Nelson, now an inmate of the Soldiers and Sailors' Home at Erie, Pa., late member of Company H, One hundred and fifty-fourth Regiment of New York Volunteers, and pay him a pension of $24 per month in lieu of the pension of $8 he is now receiving.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

In line 9 strike out all after the word "pension" and insert in place thereof the words "at the rate of $30."

In line 10 strike out the word "eight" and insert in place thereof the word "ten."

Also amend the title of the bill so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to John F. Nelson."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to refer briefly to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS] said. I infer from what he said that he thought something in my remarks had reflected on the Committee on Invalid Pensions or the members of that committee.

Mr. DRIGGS. I will say to the gentleman that I did not so consider.

Mr. SIMS. I wish to say that I think it is the duty of that committee to report all bills that they think ought to be passed and to insist on their passage in the House. I certainly admire that course, and I do not want anybody to reflect on the committee or any member of it for doing so.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLES KAUFFUNG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2597) to increase the pension of Charles Kauffung.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles Kauffung, late of Company G, First Wisconsin Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

In line 7 strike out the word "fifty" and insert in place thereof the word "thirty."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Charles Kauffung."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I submit that very few of us know anything about the circumstances and conditions of those bills. I think the reports ought to be read, or so much of them as will throw sufficient light so that we can vote intelligently. If not that, let the chairman of the committee make a short statement in regard to these bills. Now, here is a bill to increase a pension. No reasons are given in the bill, and unless the report is read we can not understand why this action is proposed.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Let the report be read.

Mr. MINOR. I can make a statement of the facts in this case which I think will satisfy the gentleman from South Carolina. This is a case of a man 65 years old, who served in a Wisconsin regiment, and who is now receiving a pension of $12 per month. He is totally blind, has not a dollar in the world, and scarcely a relative on earth. He is led through the town in which he resides by a little granddaughter 6 years of age.

Mr. TALBERT. That is a sufficient statement.

Mr. MINOR. The light is forever shut out from him——

Mr. TALBERT. That is a very sad case.

Mr. MINOR. The bill provided for $50 a month, and the committee recommended a reduction to $30 a month. That is all there is to it.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

HORATIO H. WARREN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2321) granting an increase of pension to Horatio H. Warren.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Horatio H. Warren, late of Company B, Thirteenth New Hampshire Infantry, at the rate of $50 per month, said pension to be in lieu of the one he now receives.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

After the word "roll," in line 4, insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Strike out all after the word "Hampshire," in line 6, and insert in place thereof the words "Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SMITH JEWEAL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 5430) granting a pension to Smith Jeweal.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Smith Jewell, late private in Company H, Fifteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $72 per month in lieu of that he now receives.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

Strike out the word "Jewell," in line 6, and insert in place thereof the word "Jeweal."

In line 8 strike out the words "of seventy-two" and insert in place thereof the words "at the rate of forty."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Smith Jeweal."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the report read.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read in the time of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The report (by Mr. NORTON of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5440) granting an increase of pension to Smith Jeweal, submit the following report:

Smith Jeweal, now 66 years of age, is shown to have served as a private in Company H, Fifteenth Ohio Volunteers, from September 8, 1861, to April 26, 1862, when discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability on account of asthma, due to a cold contracted by him about January 1, 1862, while in line of duty. He is now pensioned at $30 per month on account of right inguinal hernia, complete and irreducible, of service origin, under a declaration filed in January, 1888. He filed his original declaration January 28, 1883, based upon chronic diarrhea and disease of lungs.

Claim on account of disease of lungs stands rejected upon the ground that there has been no pensionable disability from said cause.

Claim on account of chronic diarrhea stands rejected upon the ground that, with the aid of a special examination, the claimant has not been able to furnish reliable and satisfactory evidence showing the continuous existence of said disability since his discharge.

The records of the War Department show that the claimant was present with his command from enrollment to December 20, 1861, and that he entered the general hospital with typhoid fever December 31, 1861, and so remained until discharge.

The Pension Bureau has admitted the origin of diarrhea in the service, but objects to the proof of continuance of the same upon the ground that such proof is diverse in character, there being several favorable witnesses, but not reported reliable by the special examiner, while others testify as to what they think or believe rather than, apparently, as to what they know positively in relation to the matter, and this action of the Pension Bureau was affirmed by the honorable Assistant Secretary of the Interior under date of September 30, 1899.

The last medical examination in the case, made in 1894, showed a hernia 2½ inches in circumference and 10 inches in length, rectum inflamed and very tender, hemorrhoidal vessels enlarged, stomach bloated and tender, three internal and three external pile tumors, the internal ones bleeding, ulcerated, and discharging pus.

A similar bill was passed during the Fifty-fifth Congress in both Houses, but so late in the session that it was not reached for Executive approval, and a report of said Congress is hereunto annexed and accepted as a part of this report.

Your committee recommends that the bill be amended as follows:

Strike out the word "Jewell," in line 6, and insert in place thereof the word "Jeweal."

In line 8 strike out the words "of seventy-two" and insert in place thereof the words "at the rate of forty."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Smith Jeweal;" and when so amended recommends its passage.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN M. LAUGHLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2666) for the relief of John M. Laughlin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John M. Laughlin, late a private of Lieut. George Melick's detachment, Twentieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $30 per month.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were read:

In line 8 strike out after the word "pension" and insert in place thereof the words "at the rate of $8 per month."

Amend the title of the bill so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to John M. Laughlin."

The amendments were agreed to.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were read:

Strike out after the word "roll," in line 4, and insert in place thereof the following:

"Subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Malinda Jones, mother of Samuel Jones, late of Company I, Eighth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

Amend the title so as to read as follows: "A bill granting a pension to Malinda Jones."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5710) to increase the pension of Charles W. Jerome.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Charles W. Jerome, late first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster, One hundred and fifteenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, war of the rebellion, to $50 per month, and to pay said Jerome back pay at that rate from 1st day of August, 1880.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

Strike out all after the word "to," in line 4, and add in place thereof the following:

"Place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles W. Jerome, late first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster, One hundred and fifteenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Also to amend the title of the bill so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Jerome."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

Lutes, late a member of Company D, One hundred and eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $25 per month.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were read:

In line 8, strike out all after the word "pension," and insert in lieu thereof the words "at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Nelson B. Lutes," and when so amended your committee recommend its passage.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ANDREW J. DAVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 524) granting an increase of pension to Andrew J. Davis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Andrew J. Davis, late of Company I, Twenty-fifth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of pension he is now receiving.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was read:

In line 8 strike out the word "fifty" and insert "thirty."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the report read, unless the member in charge of the bill or the chairman of the committee will make a statement.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. This is a case of a soldier of the war of 1861–1865 drawing a pension of $12 a month. He came over to Indianapolis as colonel of a regiment. His horse fell back upon him, broke his leg, and he is now a cripple for life.

Mr. TALBERT. Was he in the service when his horse fell on him?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

GEORGE H. PENNINGTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2477) granting an increase of pension to George H. Pennington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George H. Pennington, late a musician in Company E, Fifty-third Regiment Indiana Infantry Volunteers, and later a private of Company K, Ninety-first Regiment of Indiana Infantry Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension he now receives.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was read:

Strike out all after the word "of," in line 9, and insert in place thereof the words "$30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN C. FITNAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4698) granting an increase of pension to John C. Fitnam.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John C. Fitnam, late corporal in Company K, One hundred and fifty-sixth Illinois Volunteers, and pay him a pension of $50 a month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "pension," in line 7, and insert in lieu thereof the words, "at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I do not ask the reading of the report; it may be too lengthy; but possibly the gentleman in charge of the bill is here, and I would like to have a short statement.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from South Carolina that I am personally acquainted with the party in whose favor this bill is drawn. He is an old gentleman, was in the Army, received disabilities in the Army, and has become almost totally blind. It is a very extreme case, and I think ought to receive the favorable consideration of the committee.

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman if he incurred his disabilities in line of duty, or did he go blind at home, and it is not traceable to his service in the Army?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a complicated case. He received some of his disabilities in the Army and traces them all to his Army service.

Mr. TALBERT. And they are so many of them he is entitled to it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. He is clearly entitled to it. He is a lawyer of our State and a very prominent writer.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ALBERT HAMMER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2637) granting a pension to Albert Hammer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at $50 per month, the name of Albert Hammer, late of Company E, One hundred and twenty-third Illinois Volunteers.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "laws," in line 5, and in place thereof insert the following: "the name of Albert Hammer, late of Company E, One hundred and twenty-third Illinois Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLES ROSS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3538) granting an increase of pension to Charles Ross. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles Ross, late private, Company B, Eleventh Missouri Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of the pension which he now receives.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out all after the word "of" and insert in lieu thereof the words, "that he is now receiving."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLES PERKINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4652) granting a pension to Charles Perkins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to put upon the pension roll the name of Charles Perkins, of Manchester, Iowa, late of Company H, Sixteenth New York Heavy Artillery, at the rate of $25 per month, this sum to be in lieu of the pension that he is now receiving.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 4, after the word "to," strike out all the remaining words and insert in lieu thereof the following: "place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles Perkins, late of Company H, Sixteenth New York Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. MATILDA G. HIGBEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6575) for the relief of Mrs. Matilda G. Higbee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Mrs. Matilda G. Higbee, who officiated as nurse in various regimental hospitals for a period of nearly two years, being at the time wife of Capt. Alexander Hart, of Company I, Eighth Regiment Missouri Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "roll," in line 4, and insert in place thereof the following: "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Matilda G. Higbee, formerly Matilda G. Hart, late a nurse with the Eighth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph McCune, late a private in Company A of the Sixth Regiment of Michigan Cavalry, and to grant him a pension at the rate of $50 per month, the same to be in lieu of any pension now drawn.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 7 strike out the words "to grant" and insert the word "pay."

In line 8 strike out all after the word "month" and insert in place thereof the words "in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN J. M'CORMICK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 854) to increase the pension of John J. McCormick.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of John J. McCormick, late first lieutenant of Companies C and F, Second Regiment Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that which he is now receiving.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 7 strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty-four;" and in the same line strike out the word "which."

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division of the amendments. I want a separate vote on each amendment. The second amendment I object to, and hope it will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7 strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty-four," and in the same line strike out the word "which."

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I object to that amendment. The bill as originally drawn asked that this soldier be given $30 a month. The committee reports recommending that he be allowed only $24. Twenty-four dollars under the circumstances is a very small amount to be allowed to this old soldier. He served eight years in the Army; five years in the old Army before the war. He entered the volunteer service at the commencement of the civil war as a private soldier, rose by his merit to a first lieutenancy, and after three years' service was discharged on account of disability.

He has been allowed $12 a month under the act of 1890. His last medical examination, made in 1898, rates him at $30 a month. He is 71 years of age; he is totally blind in one eye and is fast losing his sight in the other. He is totally unable to earn a livelihood or do any manual labor whatever. He has no means of support; he has an old, dependent wife, who is now suffering from a painful and incurable disease; and $30 a month under the circumstances is a very small pension indeed. He is no thirty-days or ninety-days soldier; he is an eight-year soldier; and a man with a magnificent record in the War Department. I believe the chairman of the committee will not object to voting this amendment down.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, this is a very meritorious applicant, and he is in a very pitiable condition. The committee when it reported the bill was very conservative, as we have been all the time; but, so far as I am concerned, I will say that I have no objection to the amendment being voted down.

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I understood the gentleman to say that this applicant was totally blind, and before he got through that he was a night watchman somewhere. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULLOWAY. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman from Illinois want the amendment voted down?

Mr. WARNER. I want the amendment voted down.

Mr. SULLOWAY. This man is totally blind, or at least blind in one eye and nearly blind in the other.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to know if he is a night watchman?

Mr. WARNER. No, he is not: he is not capable of doing any work at all. I am acquainted with him.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought not to increase the amount in the bills on the floor of the House. If you do it in this case, every one is open to it. Why not recommit the bill and let the committee bring it in?

Mr. WARNER. I do not want it to lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, that makes no difference.

Mr. WARNER. It makes considerable difference.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, since this report was made several bills have come over from the Senate at $30 not so meritorious as this bill is.

Mr. SIMS. If you start the precedent of increasing the amount which the committee reports, you will soon have to do it in every case. It is a bad precedent. I think the bill ought to be recommitted and let it be reported back.

Mr. TALBERT. I can not agree with my friend from Tennessee. I think we ought to stand by the report of the committee. If we recommit the bill the poor fellow may die before he gets his pension.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

In line 9 strike out the word "which."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SOPHRONIA BAILEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1979) to pension Sophronia Bailey.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, and pay her a pension as provided by the general pension laws and regulations, the name of Sophronia Bailey, dependent mother of Capt. George A. Bailey, late of Company B, Eleventh Regiment (First Artillery) Vermont Volunteers.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out, in lines 4, 5, and 6, the words "and pay her a pension as provided by the general pension laws and regulations" and insert in lieu thereof the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 8 add, after the word "Volunteers," the following: "and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Sophronia Bailey."

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask if this amount is not unusually large?

Mr. SULLOWAY. No; this is a matter of right. She would get it at the Bureau.

Mr. LLOYD. Her husband was an officer in the Army, then?

Mr. SULLOWAY. A captain.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN VARS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 232) granting a pension to John Vars, the totally blind son of Frank Vars, late master's mate on the U. S. S. Reliance.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Vars, the totally blind son of Frank Vars, late master's mate on the U. S. S. Reliance, and grant him a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

With the following amendments recommended by the committee:

In line 7 strike out the word "grant" and insert in lieu thereof the word "pay."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to John Vars."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

PHILIP YOE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2599) granting a pension to Philip Yoe, late of Company C, Third Maryland Volunteer Infantry.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll of the United States the name of Philip Yoe, late of Company C, Third Maryland Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $12 per month.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all after the word "roll," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Philip Yoe, late of Company C, Potomac Home Brigade Maryland Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

Amend the title of the bill so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Philip Yoe."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask that the report of the committee be read. It seems this is an original pension, and I would like to know why he never received one heretofore.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I think I can explain this matter. This is a case of paralysis, nervous debility, and loss of eyesight. The soldier was in the service but seventy-five days. He did not have a ninety days' service. He has paralysis of one side, loss of eyesight, and is suffering from neurasthenia. He was rejected because he did not serve ninety days. The committee give him $12.

Mr. TALBERT. He applied for a pension, but could not get it?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Yes; because he had not served ninety days.

Mr. TALBERT. Does the gentleman think that he ought to have it?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Certainly; he is paralyzed on one side, is partially blind, and has constant neurasthenia.

Mr. TALBERT. Was he disabled, and was his disability traceable to service origin?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. TALBERT. But he only served seventy-five days.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. He had typhoid fever when he was discharged from the service. It is a good, meritorious case.

Mr. DRIGGS. He was sick two weeks before that.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Ohio must be mistaken. It could not be that his claim was rejected at the Pension Bureau because he had not served ninety days if the disability was traceable to service origin. It must have been on a technical ground.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. It was on a technical ground. He came home and laid for five weeks with typhoid fever, and it was on the technical ground that his typhoid fever was not of service origin; but he really had it when he was discharged.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

FANNIE H. RIGGIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 825) to increase the pension of F. H. Riggin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to increase the pension of F. H. Riggin, widow of Gen. John Riggin, Gen. U. S. Grant's staff, United States Volunteers, war of the rebellion, and that she be paid a pension of $30 per month.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, and agreed to, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "hereby," in line 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Fannie H. Riggin, widow of John Riggin, late colonel and aid-de-camp, United States Volunteers, on the staff of General Grant, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

Amend the title of the bill so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Fannie H. Riggin."

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARGARET BOMKE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2526) granting a pension to Margaret Bomke.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Bomke, widow of Edmund Bomke, late quartermaster-sergeant of Eleventh Regiment of New York Militia, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, and agreed to, as follows:

In line 6 strike out "Margaret" and insert in lieu thereof "Margarethe."

In line 8 strike out the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eight."

After the word "month," in line 8, add the following: "and $2 per month additional for each of the two minor children of the soldier."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Margarethe Bomke."

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

FRANCES C. KIRBY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5156) granting an increase of pension to Frances C. Kirby.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place the name of Frances C. Kirby, widow of Capt. George B. Kirby, late of Company I, Forty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteers Infantry, on the pension roll and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of the pension which she is now receiving.

The amendments reported by the committee were read and agreed to, as follows:

In line 4, after the word "place," insert the following: "on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 6 strike out "Volunteers" and insert in place thereof the word "Volunteer."

Strike out, in lines 6 and 7, the words "on the pension roll."

In line 7 strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifteen."

In line 8 strike out the words "the pension which" and insert in place thereof the word "that."

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

HENRY H. BROWN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4090) granting an increase of pension to Henry H. Brown.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Henry H. Brown, late a member of Company I, Fifty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, and pay him a pension of $24 per month in lieu of any pension he may be drawing.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 6 strike out the word "Volunteers" and insert the words "Volunteer Infantry."

In the same line strike out all after the word "pension" and insert in place thereof the words "at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Will not the gentleman from South Carolina, instead of having the report read, allow me to make a statement?

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to hear the report or a statement.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I will make a statement, with the gentleman's permission.

This man was in the service four years six months and a half—a magnificent service. He is drawing $12 under the act of June 9. At the Pension Office he was turned down because they said his disabilities were not chargeable to his service, when the records, the affidavits on file, show that while in the service he had the measles, which settled in his right eye; that his sight was never cleared up, so that he became absolutely blind in that eye, a disability for which he draws no pension.

I know this man; I know him well. His condition is not caused by any vicious habits. He has no property; he worked hard as long as he had any ability to work.

In view of his service of over four years, in view of the fact that he is drawing a pension of only $12, the committee were inclined to give him $30, but finally decided to cut it down to $20.

Mr. TALBERT. I understand the gentleman to say that this man's disabilities are not traceable to service origin.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The Department has so held, in spite of the fact that during his service he had measles, which settled in his right eye, the sight of which never cleared up, so that ten years afterwards he lost the sight of that eye entirely. As a member of the committee, I believe that his disability is traceable to service origin, and that he ought to have a pension of $50.

Mr. SIMS. What does the medical examining board show?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. They held that the disability was not of service origin. But in point of fact it is shown by affidavits, etc., which are a part of the record, that this man contracted measles while in the service, and from this resulted loss of sight. But the examining board holds that the man's blindness can not be traced to service origin.

Mr. SIMS. My question is, What do the examining surgeons in the Pension Bureau hold? Do they hold that the disability is not of service origin?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes, sir; they so hold.

Mr. SIMS. Then does the gentleman from Indiana propose to say to this House that he knows better than the surgeons who have made their official report on this subject?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I believe that we ought to take the proof which is on file. There are among the papers the affidavits of three surgeons, physicians residing at the man's home, who declare that in their judgment the disability is of service origin. Relying upon such testimony, I will state to the gentleman that I think I have better judgment on this subject than H. Clay Evans.

Mr. SIMS. I did not refer to H. Clay Evans, but to the examining surgeons who made this report.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. H. Clay Evans is represented by the examining surgeons, who, after setting out the facts, conclude that the disability is not of service origin. From that conclusion I dissent.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the examining surgeons in the Pension Bureau are making just such reports as H. Clay Evans dictates or desires?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I think so.

Mr. SIMS. That is your charge?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes, sir; and I believe it is well founded.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that every word the gentleman from Indiana has said is true; but I submit that we ought to have something else besides statements of members in support of these bills. There ought to be affidavits presented to the committee.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. There are three affidavits of this man's home physicians.

Mr. GAINES. I was about to ask whether there were reports from any other physicians than those of the Pension Bureau?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes; three. I assure the House there is not a more meritorious case on this Calendar than the one now pending.

Mr. RAY of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana two or three questions. In the first place, how long did this soldier serve?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Four years three months and, I believe, thirteen days, to be exact.

Mr. RAY of New York. And he has a good record?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY of New York. What is his pecuniary condition to-day?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. He is absolutely helpless and unable to labor; he has expended all the means he ever had.

Mr. RAY of New York. And there is no one on whom he can depend for support?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. No one.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then we have presented here this case. There is a doubtful question at the Pension Bureau that they have decided against him, as to whether his disabilities are of service origin. The committee gave him the benefit of that doubt. Now, I submit that if it were found that his disabilities were not of service origin, here is the case of a soldier who served four years, who is now old and poverty stricken and must go to the poorhouse unless Congress does something for him.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, you do not need to put it on the ground that you are overruling the Pension Bureau. Put it on the ground of justice to an old soldier; that you are keeping him out of the poorhouse.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Still, when the gentleman from South Carolina asks me what I believe, I am compelled to say that I believe it is of service origin.

Mr. GAINES. I understand that three of his home physicians so state.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. But the Commissioner is an officer of the Government. Do you want a charge made here against him, with no chance to vindicate himself? I understood the gentleman from Indiana to state, in answer to my question, that the examining surgeons in the Bureau made just such a report as the Commissioner dictated.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The gentleman knows that whatever was said was said in the heat of debate——

Mr. SIMS. If it is true, the country ought to know it; and if it is not true, the gentleman from Indiana ought not to make the statement.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Oh, no; but there is a general feeling which prevails that it goes from the Commissioner down through the minor examiners and that a good many doubts are resolved against the old soldier.

Mr. SIMS. I simply want the record to show how the thing occurred.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. When the bill H. R. 5166 was called a few moments ago I lost track of the proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that there was an error in the printed Calendar. It will be made all right.

ZADOK C. PERKINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5186) for the increase of pension of Zadok C. Perkins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Zadok C. Perkins, late of Company D, Second Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension now paid him, he being totally blind.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

Strike out all after "to," in line 4, and insert: "Place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Zadok C. Perkins, late of Company D, Second Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Zadok C. Perkins."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. CALDERHEAD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5188) granting an increase of pension to Zadok C. Perkins, submit the following report:

The beneficiary, now 56 years of age, served as a private in Company D, Second Iowa Cavalry, from August 27, 1861, to September 19, 1865. He first applied for a pension in August, 1877, on account of injury to right leg from the kick of a horse, and was pensioned from discharge for said disability at $2 per month.

In December, 1883, he applied on account of an additional disability—chronic diarrhea and piles and disease of lungs—and in 1892 he was pensioned at $4 from December 22, 1883, on account of the leg injury and chronic diarrhea, and the claim on account of piles and disease of lungs was rejected upon the ground of no disability from said causes. He is now a pensioner under the act of June 27, 1890, at $12 per month, by reason of injury to leg, chronic diarrhea, and disease of eyes.

During the prosecution of his claim under the act of June 27, 1890, the soldier stated that he first noticed an impairment of sight in July or August, 1897.

A medical examination of the beneficiary before an oculist, on March 20, 1899, revealed atrophy of the optic nerve of both eyes, causing for all practical purposes total blindness, the vision of the left eye being nothing better than light perception; right eye was found totally blind; and the oculist who examined him stated that the claimant came to him for advice in 1898 as to vision; that he advised no treatment, as he considered the prospects of a cure hopeless, and stated further that the blindness was not due to any specific disease.

There has been filed with your committee the affidavit of this same oculist, to the effect that he examined the claimant on January 21, 1900, and found total blindness of both eyes, requiring the regular aid of another person, and that while he did not know what caused the atrophy of the optic nerves, he found nothing to indicate that the trouble was due to vicious habits.

The wife of the pensioner, whose affidavit was also filed with your committee, states that he has no property except his pension and 80 acres of land in Adair County, Iowa, valued at $2,000 and mortgaged at $1,200, and that the income from the rent of the land would not more than pay the interest on mortgage, the taxes, and repairs.

In view of the sad affliction of the soldier, who rendered the Government four years of faithful service, the pensioner should, now that he is totally blind, receive such a pension as to keep him from the poorhouse and afford to him and to his wife the necessaries of life, and your committee recommends that the bill be amended as follows:

Strike out all after the the word "to," in line 4, and insert in place thereof the following: "place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Zadok C. Perkins, late of Company D, Second Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Amend the title of the bill so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Zadok C. Perkins."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry, or rather to make a motion, if it is in order. It is that the committee rise, and that we take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock, when we can come back here and take up this Calendar right where it is, and finish these bills.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, that motion is not in order. The order of the House terminates this session at 10.30 o'clock, and the resolution of the House adjourns it, at the close of this session, until Monday morning.

Mr. SIMS. Can we not take a recess until to-morrow?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The standing rule of the House puts an end to this session at half past 10 o'clock to-night.

Mr. SIMS. Can it not be done by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SIMS. Then I move that the committee rise, and that we get into the House, where we can do something.

The motion was rejected.

The bill H. R. 5186 as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the various bills to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, reported that that committee had had under consideration the following bills and had directed him to report the same to the House with amendments and with the recommendation that as amended the bills do pass:

Also, that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5188) granting a pension to David C. Dane, and had directed him to report the same to the House without amendment and with the recommendation that the same do pass.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question may be considered as ordered upon these several bills and their amendments to their final passage.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. If that is done, will that not put these bills as unfinished business, to come up for passage next Friday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the bills, without ordering the previous question, will come up as unfinished business on Friday next; but with the previous question ordered the Chair thinks they would be the unfinished business for Monday next, and would be in order on Monday.

The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] asks unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on the several bills that have been reported and the amendments thereto to the final passage of each bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. It lacks two minutes of the hour of adjournment. A motion to adjourn in pursuance of the order made by the House this morning will be in order, to save a minute or two.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, before we adjourn, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions a question for information. Is there any law allowing an ex-Confederate soldier who served in the recent war with Spain a pension?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I understand there is. I think they are being pensioned.

Mr. GAINES. When was it passed?

Mr. SULLOWAY. It is my impression that there is such a law.

Mr. GAINES. The reason why I ask the question is this: I have here a copy of a letter published in a paper which I received to-day, in which it is stated that the law reads as follows—and that is the law as far as I have been able to find out——

Mr. SULLOWAY. I think the gentleman is right, and that there are bills pending to correct that now.

Mr. GAINES. Section 4716 of the Revised Statutes of the United States reads as follows:

No money on account of pensions shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, or children, or kin of any deceased person who in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aided or abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I think the gentleman is right, and that legislation is needed to correct that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My own impression is that the law pensioning the Spanish war soldiers makes no distinction against ex-Confederate soldiers. If that be so, then by implication it repeals the section which the gentleman has read; and I want to say if that is not repealed it is mighty bad for the law of this country, and it must not stand very long.

Mr. GAINES. Well, I join you in saying that, and I wish to say, if I may be allowed for a moment, that an ex-member of this Congress, Col. John H. Savage, who was a Mexican war veteran and an ex-Confederate, has called my attention to the matter through the press. I should like to insert this short letter by unanimous consent in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the request of the gentleman will be granted.

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

To the editor of the American:

Section 4716, Revised Statutes of the United States, reads:

"No money on account of pensions shall be paid to any person or to the widow, children, or kin of any deceased person who in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aided and abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States."

The American will please let the people know whether or not any Senator or Congressman from Tennessee has made an effort to repeal this unjust statute; and if so, name the man and the work he has done.

This statute stopped the payment of all pensions in the Southern States allowed for wounds and disabilities incurred in the war with Mexico, it being assumed by the United States officials that all persons in the Southern States were either rebels or aided and abetted the rebellion.

After years of battle before the people and in Congress, in which Tennessee Senators and Congressmen were slow to act, the law was passed which gave to soldiers and officers in the war with Mexico a pension of $8 per month, and is the only pension law known to me which reduces the pay of the officer to a level with the private. This law made no provision for placing upon the pension rolls the soldiers who had pensions allowed them for disability in the war with Mexico.

A proper law then and now would be to direct the pension officer to audit the claims of these soldiers and officers that now live, to allow them disability pensions as their due under the existing law, deduct from the amount the sum received under the $8 act, and pay the balance.

There is another unjust discrimination against Mexican veterans. They killed Mexicans, added to the Republic a territory in extent and value transcending the conquests of Cæsar or Napoleon, and for this the Government in their helpless old age allows them $8 per month, while at the same time paying another crop of pensioners, who killed Americans, and by great armies overrun, conquered, and desolated twelve States, $12 per month to privates, and no reduction for officers.

Has President McKinley, while uttering many and eloquent words to compliment the patriotism and courage of Southern soldiers in the war with Spain and Philippines, recommended the repeal of this unjust and odious section 4716, and of paying the soldier who killed Mexicans as much and putting him upon a level with the soldiers who killed Americans? Is sectional hate and party policy still too strong to allow the President to recommend this act of equal and exact justice to all?

JOHN H. SAVAGE.

FEBRUARY 3, 1900.

The SPEAKER (at 10 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.). In pursuance of the standing rule of the House, and of the order made this morning, the House stands adjourned until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States of America extends its sympathy to the people of the South African Republic in their heroic struggle for liberty and popular government, and believes it to be the duty of the Government of the United States of America to offer mediation, to the end that further bloodshed may be averted and an honorable peace may be concluded between the belligerent governments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Secretary will kindly read the first ten lines of the Senate committee's amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the first section of the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance, as follows:

That the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine shall, as established by section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, continue to be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard; and United States notes, and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, when presented to the Treasury for redemption, shall be redeemed in gold coin of such standard.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, in his work on the Law of Civilization and Decay, Mr. Brooks Adams makes the following impressive statement:

It appears to be a natural law that when social development has reached a certain stage, and capital has accumulated sufficiently, the class which has had the capacity to absorb it shall try to enhance the value of their property by legislation. This is done most easily by reducing the quantity of the currency which is a legal tender for the payment of debts.

Whether or not Mr. Adams's assertion is true historically, it correctly describes the present situation. Those who have absorbed the gold of the world are trying to make it more valuable by legislation. That is the natural meaning of the first ten lines of the Senate bill. There is no need of the law for any other object. Absolutely no other purpose is to be subserved by those lines. The passage of this bill without adequate recognition of the desire and the determination of the American people that silver shall be remonetized is a defiance of the Republican platform of 1896, and without such recognition in the bill I can not give to it my vote. It would be unqualified gold monometallism, and to advocate or submit to this is an abandonment of Republican principles.

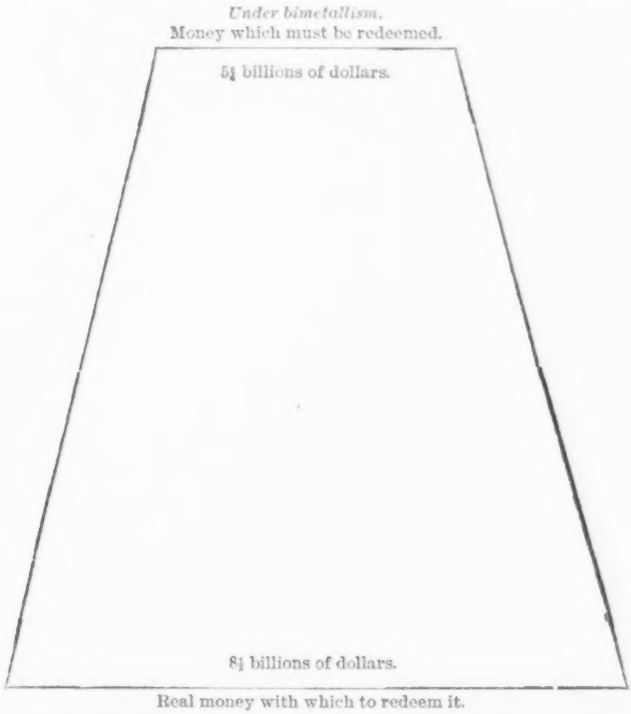
THE PROGRESS OF THE DEMONETIZATION OF SILVER.

The progress of the demonetization of silver, about which so much has been written and spoken, can be described with reasonable brevity. For many centuries down to 1873, notably for one hundred and eighty-six years, gold and silver coins circulating at ratios of either 14, 15, or 16 to 1 had both been real money—that is to say, neither gold nor silver coins had it been necessary to redeem in any other money. In round numbers, the gold coin of the world was four billions (four thousand millions) of dollars. The silver money of the world was four billions (four thousand millions). Upon this basis of eight thousand millions of coin, and in addition the gold and silver bullion of the world, which was subject to coinage if required, was built up all the other money of the world—all the paper money of various kinds and all the credits of the world—and this system of paper money and credits built upon metallic money was, on the whole, safe and satisfactory and promotive of the best interests of mankind.

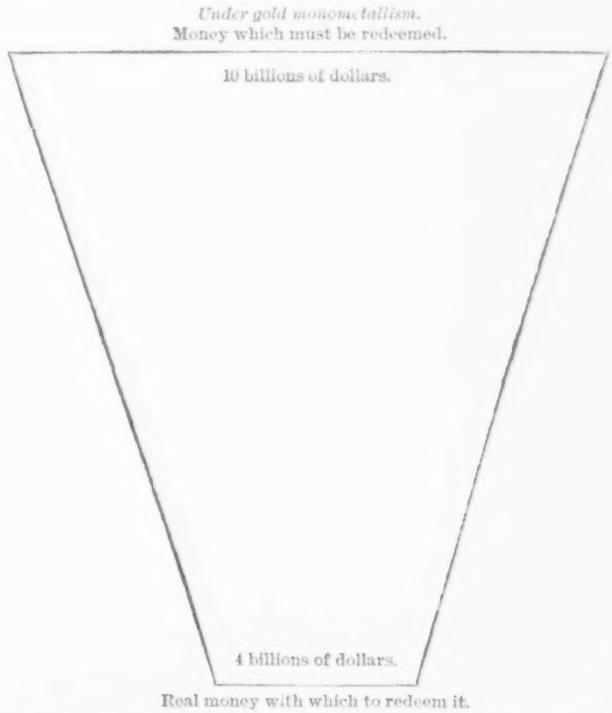
In 1873 the process of making gold more valuable by legislation was begun. The mints of the various countries one after another were closed against silver coinage. The effect of this closure was retarded by efforts to prevent it. Much gold bullion newly mined was yearly added to the coined money. Only the silver bullion, old and new, was excluded, and that not wholly, for much silver continued to be coined in the United States, and silver bullion was purchased by the Government, reaching in ounces 497,193,855.47 after 1873, and silver was also coined to some extent elsewhere. The four billions of silver coin still remained real money and not promises to pay gold money. The production of gold was stimulated and largely increased. The progress of demonetization was slow, and up to this time its injury to mankind has not been fully realized.

But any retardation of the movement to make gold more valuable does not suit the gold class. Further steps are therefore now demanded in the interest of that class, namely, that all the existing silver coin shall be put out from the condition of real money and placed in the condition of credit money; that is, money all which must be redeemed on demand in gold. If the progress of this new principle to govern the money of the world which is demanded by the gold class is to prevail in free America, this century is to end practically with no real money in the world except the gold of the world, of which not much over $4,000,000,000 is coined money, upon which is to be built up all the paper money and all the credits of the world, and in addition the four billions of silver coins which must on demand be redeemed in gold.

THE PRESENT SITUATION IN THE WORLD AT LARGE.



What, then, will be the situation? The real money will be four billions of gold (subject to be increased by such portions of the six or seven billions of existing gold bullion and of the annual gold product as it may be possible, by reason of the new conditions, to draw into the mints), and the credit money of the world, including the silver money, will be ten billions; and upon this gold and this credit money are to be built all the checks and other credits in trade throughout the world. How broad is the summit and how narrow is the base! This change in the world's financial system which the gold class intend to bring about can be seen at a glance.



The total gold and silver money of the world is as follows:
Gold		$4,135,100,000
Full silver	$3,640,600,000
Subsidiary silver	853,400,000
Total silver		4,494,000,000
Total metallic money		8,629,100,000
The paper currency of the world is about as follows:
Bank notes	$4,062,000,000
Government notes	1,702,900,000
Total		5,764,900,000
So that the metallic money in gold and silver has been in excess of the paper money		2,864,200,000

But under the proposed gold monometallism the total metallic or real money is the gold money		$4,135,100,000
The total money which must be redeemed is—
Silver	$4,494,000,000
Paper	5,764,900,000
		10,258,900,000
The money which must be redeemed is in excess of the real money by the amount of		6,123,800,000

(See Muhleman on the Monetary Systems of the World, page 177.)

The two situations may be well illustrated by diagrams as follows:

If an illustration is of any value, I ask Senators to consider which of those columns is the more likely to tip over in an emergency in the world's financial affairs.

THE PRESENT SITUATION IN THE UNITED STATES.

The situation in the United States will not be as unfortunate under the proposed gold monometallism as it will be in the world at large. But the change will be most unwise.

The gold in the United States, including bullion in the United States Treasury, was, on January 1, 1900	$1,016,009,857
The silver money in the United States was $476,201,341 and $79,643,721, making	555,845,062
The total metallic money was	1,571,854,919
The total money in circulation, less the gold and silver coins, was	1,215,348,972
Leaving a surplus of real money of	356,505,947

The situation under gold monometallism would be—

Gold in the United States, as above estimated	$1,016,009,857
Money in circulation, excluding the gold, but including the silver	1,362,420,340
Making a deficit of real money of	346,410,483

(See United States Treasury circulation statement, January 1, 1900.)

In determining whether to thus reduce the quantity of real money in the world from eight and one-half billions of dollars to four billions it is worth while to consider the effect upon a country so largely in debt as the United States.

In my remarks in the Senate on February 16, 1897, was summarized the indebtedness of individuals and corporations in the United States in 1890. Not reckoning $2,027,170,546 national, State, and local debts, the sum was sixteen thousand millions of dollars, as appears by the estimate of Mr. George K. Holmes, the head of the Bureau of Mortgages, in the Department of Labor Bulletin for November, 1895 (page 48), while the value of property in the United States, by the census of 1890, was sixty-five thousand millions of dollars. Mr. Matthew Marshall, in the New York Sun of December 27, 1899, restates the mass of debt in the United States, including national, State, and local debts, as follows:

National debt bearing interest (1899)	$1,046,000,000
National debt not bearing interest (1899)	389,000,000
State, county, etc., debt (1890)	1,125,000,000
Real estate mortgages (1890)	6,019,000,000
Railroad debts (1898)	5,900,000,000
Bank loans and discounts (1899)	5,751,000,000
Total	20,240,000,000

We have thus a total of $20,240,000,000 of debt upon $65,000,000,000 of assets, or a proportion of $1 owed to every $3 owned. It is true that the valuation of the wealth of the country, if it were made now, would probably be much more than $65,000,000,000, so that the proportion to it of the above total of debts of $20,240,000,000 would be less than 1 to 3. On the other hand, the debts enumerated in the table do not include those of private corporations other than railroad companies, nor the innumerable little debts owing to individuals for money lent on personal security. Making allowances on both sides of the account, it is, therefore, safe to assume, approximately, that the property of the citizens of this country is encumbered by debts to the amount of one-third of its value, and to that extent does not belong to its owners.

How marvelous it would be if, under these conditions, the United States should join Great Britain and Germany in the effort to make the four billions of gold the total real money of the whole world. What a preposterous proposition it is which the gold-standard nations make to the silver nations and the double-standard nations, when they demand the demonetization of the four billions of silver, in order to make the four billions of gold grow more and more valuable for the benefit of the few and the injury of the many.

It is true that it is claimed that as we now have what are called good times and prosperity in America, it is apparent that no harm has happened so far to this country from the demonetization of silver, and that all the apprehensions and the predictions of the bimetallists are to be ridiculed and disregarded. It is, however, easy to understand why we have not been suffering in the United States during the last two years from the effects of demonetization. It is simply because the balance of trade has been so heavily in our favor. The dearer the money of the world is, the better off, for the time being, are the money classes of the nation to which other countries owe large quantities of that money.

THE FAVORABLE BALANCE OF TRADE PROTECTS THE UNITED STATES—WILL IT CONTINUE?

The figures as to the balance of trade are as follows.

Making a total for deduction of excess for 3 years and 6 months of gold imports over exports of		211,052,108
Total balance in our favor, merchandise and gold and silver, since 1889 (11 years and 6 months)		2,775,635,725

But is it not a startling fact that notwithstanding the world has owed us this $2,986,687,833, we have obtained only $211,052,108 in gold as the result; have, in fact, made a net loss in the eleven years and six months of one hundred and eleven millions of gold, because between 1889 and 1897 our exports over imports of gold were three hundred and twenty-three millions? Where should we have been if the balance of trade had been even or against us? Where could we have obtained the gold to send abroad? Would it have been wise for our citizens to have gone into the markets of Europe to there borrow the sum of $2,775,635,725?

WHAT BECOMES OF THE BALANCE IN OUR FAVOR?

This balance of trade in our favor not received in gold may be partly accounted for by our securities owned abroad and sent home for collection or sale in our money markets. There is no way of estimating the amounts thus sent home. Various estimates are, however, made of the other amounts we have to settle with Europe. Mr. Muhleman, on page 193, outside of statistical information as to our exports and imports, including gold and silver, estimates that the United States pay and receive annual amounts as follows:

We pay—
Interest	$75,000,000 to	$100,000,000
Travelers' expenses	60,000,000 to	100,000,000
Freight moneys to foreign shipowners	35,000,000 to	75,000,000
Undervaluations in imports		5,000,000
Immigrants' remittances		25,000,000
Total against us		305,000,000
We receive—
Immigrants' moneys		15,000,000
Travelers' moneys		10,000,000
Shipping expenses		15,000,000
Remittances to immigrants		10,000,000
Total for us		50,000,000
This makes an annual balance against us, not reckoning interest paid and allowing the above estimate as to our receipts, of		155,000,000
And if we pay the $100,000,000 interest money annually, we have to provide by new borrowing abroad, or by gold remittances, annually		250,000,000
Or in ten years		2,500,000,000 which fairly uses up the balance of trade in our favor in eleven years and six months of $2,775,635,725. I repeat the pertinent inquiry, What would have been our condition if the balance of trade had not been in our favor? Are we sure it will always be in our favor?

THE CASE FOR BIMETALLISM REMAINS STRONG.

In truth, in spite of the temporary present conditions—the apparently vast balance of trade in favor of the United States and the recent largely increased production of gold—the world-wide case in favor of bimetallism still remains unimpaired and is liable at any moment to become acute and dangerous.

That case is that down to 1873 the two metals together, the whole world's stock on hand, including from year to year the new products of the mines, being all the gold and silver in existence, coined or uncoined, contributed to furnish a mass of metallic money, gradually increasing in volume, sufficient (1) to supply the demands occasioned by the growth of the world's commerce; (2) to constitute a just and fair measure of the world's values, and sustain the prices of the commodities of mankind so that no injustice was done to producers or debtors; (3) to justify and support the issues of the paper money and the credits of the world; and, further (4), under this system was maintained a fixed par of exchange between the nations, and violent fluctuations in exchange prevented.

THE CASE AGAINST GOLD MONOMETALLISM REMAINS STRONG.

Necessarily, therefore, it follows that the countercase against gold monometallism is that the steady progress toward the exclusion of the silver coin of the world from the position of money and the rejection of the silver bullion of the world as a metal from which to coin money (1) tends to a reduction in the prices of commodities, represses business enterprises, and oppresses producers and debtors; (2) breaks the par of exchange with the nations whose money is silver, and will (3), when the intended result is fully reached, leave the metallic money of the world reduced to so small a volume in proportion to the proper demand for such money that money panics will come oftener, last longer, and be more disastrous than under a system where the world's money is derived from all the silver as well as all the gold.

THE PRESENT RISE IN PRICES AND INCREASE IN GOLD PRODUCTION MAY NOT CONTINUE.

Of course I am familiar with the answer which will now be made to this restatement of the case against gold monometallism, namely, that recently prices of commodities have ceased to go down; that the greatly increased production of gold has removed the danger of an insufficient supply of metallic money, and that therefore the silver question is now a dead issue.

It is true that the prices of commodities during the last two years have ceased to fall and have begun to rise. I reproduce Mr. Sauerbeck's table of index numbers, from which it appears that, although beginning with the period of eleven years between 1867 and 1877, having an index number of 100, the number went steadily down until in 1896 it reached the low figure of 61; yet it has now risen again until it reached 71 in November, 1899.

The result of the Royal Statistical Society's numbers, prepared by Mr. Sauerbeck, is as follows:

Year.	Index number.	Year.	Index number.
1875	96	1888	70
1876	95	1889	72
1877	94	1890	72
1878	87	1891	72
1879	83	1892	68
1880	88	1893	68
1881	85	1894	67
1882	84	1895	67
1883	82	1896	61
1884	76	1897	62
1885	72	1898	61
1886	69	1899, November	71
1887	68

Mr. Sauerbeck's numbers are confirmed by those of Mr. Wharton Barker in the Philadelphia American of January 27, 1900. Since July 1, 1897, Mr. Barker's general index number of 100 articles has slowly risen from 76 up to 99 on October 1, 1899, and to 101 on January 1, 1900. Mr. Barker's tables, however, begun January 1, 1891, with an index number of 100, and on the same date Mr. Sauerbeck's index number was 72, as compared with his number 96 in 1875.

The increased production of gold in recent years is shown as follows:

Production of gold in the whole world in recent years.

Year.	Amount.	Year.	Amount.
1891	$130,650,000	1897	$238,812,000
1892	146,651,500	1898	287,428,600
1893	157,494,800	1899 (estimated)	312,000,000
1894	181,567,800
1895	200,285,700	Total	1,857,142,000
1896	202,251,600

Such arguments as can be based upon the foregoing facts bimetallists are confronted with. The answer I make is this:

First. As to the course of prices, there is no certainty that the rise in prices, which are still only about three-fourths of their former rate, will be increased or even maintained. There is an ebb and flow in every prolonged movement in human affairs.

Second. Neither is it certain that the increased production of gold will continue. At various times in the history of the production of gold and silver there has been alarm amounting almost to panic in connection with sudden discoveries of large bodies of one or the other of the precious metals. The instances are as follows:

During the years from 1781 to 1830, about fifty years, the proportion of the production of gold and silver (coining value) was as follows: 24 to 76, 24 to 76, 25 to 75, 33 to 67. Come on down, however, to 1851, and from 1851 to 1870 the conditions were exactly reversed, and the percentage of the production of gold to silver was 78 of gold to 22 of silver, 78 to 22, 73 to 27, 70 to 30; and yet during all those periods practical bimetallism prevailed and maintained the ratio of 15½ to 1, notwithstanding the variations in the quantities of the two metals produced. France, principally, ran the risk and bore the strain whenever the production of either metal took place in unusual quantities disproportionate to the production of the other metal. In 1848 and 1851 there were enormous discoveries of gold in California and Australia. The bimetallic link of 15½ to 1 was threatened. France, between 1853 and 1860, boldly took $616,000,000 worth of gold and parted to other nations with $293,000,000 worth of silver; and bimetallism was saved. Later, toward 1873, when silver began to be more abundantly produced than gold, France again tried to hold the ratio firm, and there can be little doubt that, even against nominal demonetization of silver by the United States in 1873 and the continued efforts of England to establish the single standard of gold, France would have continued to maintain the parity of silver with gold at the ratio of 15½ to 1 had it not been for the action of Germany on the 9th day of July, 1873, when, enriched by the French indemnity of one thousand millions in gold, that Government began to sell its silver thalers, and thus joined England in the movement to demonetize silver.

Therefore, not by reason of these fluctuations in production was the system of bimetallism temporarily broken down. The consensus of the nations maintained the value of the two metals in accordance with the ratio—14, 15, or 16 to 1—and if silver were now to be remonetized there is not the slightest reason to believe that the ratio of that consensus of the nations would be disturbed by the large quantities of gold coming from the mines of the world. On the contrary, this increased production of gold is exactly what is needed to offset the increased silver production complained of, which led to the steps which have been taken toward the demonetization of silver. Look at the comparative production of the two metals within the last five years and see if it can be said that there is to-day any danger that with silver completely remonetized the new silver money would so far exceed the new gold money that the system of metallic money, consisting of both gold and silver, which has existed from the foundation of the world, must be destroyed by the exclusion entirely of one of the metals from being treated as any part of that system of metallic money.

Here is exhibited exactly a condition which justifies bimetallism. Gold has been increasing in proportion to silver, but that is no reason for demonetizing the latter. What has become of the fright about the overproduction of silver, which has helped the work of demonetizing that metal since 1873?

FLUCTUATIONS IN GOLD AND SILVER PRODUCTION DO NO HARM UNDER BIMETALLISM.

A change in the relative production of the two metals from time to time does no harm so long as both are real money. The great discoveries of silver in America did not demonetize it, neither was gold actually demonetized, notwithstanding the fright about its overproduction in 1848 and 1851 in California and Australia. Examine this table of the production of gold and silver in the world since 1492. See how nearly equal the coining values—gold, $10,000,000,000; silver, $11,000,000,000.

[From 1493 to 1885 the above figures are from a table of averages for certain periods compiled by Dr. Adolph Soetbeer. For the years 1886 to 1896 the production is the annual estimate of the United States Bureau of the Mint. The table down to and including 1895 is contained in the report of the Director of the Mint for 1895, House Document No. 23, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, page 346; and the estimates since 1895 are made by the Director of the Mint.]

Indeed, the outcry which is being made against bimetallism in connection with the increased production of gold and the beneficent effect of that increase upon money and business entitles the bimetallists to ask the gold monometallists with increased earnestness, What right have you to destroy the silver of the world as a money metal simply because there is just now a largely increased quantity of gold? You admit by your present claim the quantity theory of money, and that the more metallic money there is the better for mankind, the more active will be our industries, and the more prosperous will be our people.

Mr. George E. Roberts, Director of the Mint, in his report for 1899 (page 6), says:

> The world's stock of coin is now being increased more rapidly and by a higher annual percentage to the existing stock than during the period from 1850 to 1880, when the great output of gold from California and Australia startled the economists of all countries and gave the world a depreciating standard of value. The effect of this new flood of standard money upon the markets, the industries, the earnings of those who work for wages, and all the varied relations of the people in our present highly organized society will be a most interesting study. It must be a potent factor in affairs.

All this the bimetallists have constantly claimed; and they now merely say that because silver happened for a time to be produced in largely increased quantities, and that because now gold happens to be so produced, there follows no reason whatever for demonetizing either the one metal or the other. The true lesson to be learned from the increased gold product is that this is a most favorable moment for retracing the steps which have been taken toward the demonetization of silver, and that here and now, in connection with this largely increased gold supply, we should restore silver to its position of real money and secure a new consensus of the nations, which will not be likely to again be broken, but will last as long as the precious metals are made the medium of exchanges among mankind and constitute the measure of the values of the world.

SHALL WE REPEAL OUR TARIFF LAWS BECAUSE OF OUR INCREASED EXPORTATION OF MANUFACTURED GOODS?

This is not a question of a year or of a decade, but the question of a policy to be pursued through centuries. We do not change from well-settled principles of governmental policy by reason of accidental happenings, which may be temporary. During the last year we have exported immense quantities of manufactured goods.

The facts are stated by Mr. O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, as follows:

No feature of the marvelous growth of our foreign commerce is more striking than that relating to exports of iron and steel. * * * The total exports of manufactures of iron and steel have for the first time crossed the $100,000,000 line. In the calendar year 1890 the total exports of iron and steel amounted to $27,000,000, and in 1899 they were $105,689,645. Meantime, the importations of manufactures of iron and steel have decreased with nearly equal rapidity, the importations of 1890 being $44,544,140 and those of 1899, $15,799,206. One especially striking feature of this rapid growth is our exportations of manufactures of iron and steel is the fact that European countries are taking largely from us in these lines. * * * For new and ingenious machinery the world seems now to be looking to the United States. * * *

The following table shows the exports of leading classes of manufactures of iron and steel in the calendar year 1899 compared with those of 1889:

*Not stated.

I am informed, although I have not the figures, that our exports of manufactures last year amounted to above $370,000,000. If I am wrong, the Senators of the Finance Committee can correct me. This certainly seems to show that the high tariff upon articles like the foregoing coming from foreign countries is unnecessarily high. Are protectionists, therefore, ready, and do we propose to immediately repeal or reduce the tariff on all such products?

I do not hear of any proposition made by the Committee on Finance to reduce the duties on manufactured goods simply because of these large exports during the past year. If we are not to do this, why does anyone propose, because of a temporary increased production of gold, to cease efforts to remonetize silver and go on to declare gold monometallism to be the true permanent system of money?

THE SLOW EFFECT OF ECONOMIC SHOCKS.

Those of my colleagues who did me the honor to listen to my remarks in the Senate on February 16, 1897, and June 1, 1898, will remember that a large part of those remarks was given to the effort to show the great length of time which must elapse in the world of commerce, business, and finance before the evil effect of the demonetization of silver will be fully felt. The theory of the slow propagation of economic shocks brought out by Francis A. Walker and other economists lies at the foundation of my deep convictions on the subject now under debate.

On February 16 I said:

One of the most felicitous and characteristic parts of General Walker's argument in his book on Bimetallism is where he answers those writers who speak of the readjustment of social forces to meet changed conditions as if it were always a speedy movement—

Like changing cars at a railway junction. As stated by me on June 1—

It was the principal part of my effort on February 16 to show that the progress of economic changes is slow. In reaching conclusions conditions existing during short periods and in exceptional circumstances prove but little. It is the long run of the money system which must be scrutinized.

Professor Cairnes, quoted by General Walker in Bimetallism (pages 243, 244, and 245), speaks of the progressive effect upon prices of great changes in the money of the world as likely to "extend over some thirty or forty years."

It has indeed already been a long period during which the effects of progressive demonetization have made themselves only partially felt. Mistakes in argument have been made on both sides, as special and temporary causes have intensified or delayed the effects of demonetization. When the prices of commodities go up, gold monometallists say the bimetallists are demolished. When wheat goes down, the bimetallists say the monometallists should be confounded. These are the ups and downs of what is, on the whole, the progress of demonetization, which if not arrested is in the end to make gold the only real money of the world and silver merely a metal for which there is to be some limited demand for token coinage and for use in the arts.

NOW IS A FAVORABLE TIME FOR REMONETIZATION.

Therefore, instead of taking advantage of the present favorable condition of business and finance in the United States by repudiating any idea that silver is to be remonetized and by declaring for gold monometallism, it seems to me, with all due deference to perhaps wiser, certainly more powerful men, now is the very time to renew and carry to a successful conclusion the movement toward the remonetization of silver to which we Republicans have so often pledged ourselves. On June 1, 1898, I showed that the answer of England to the proposals of the envoys from the United States was not made as a finality. The British Government then declined to give an agreement to reopen the India mints because the council for India believed that India could be brought to a gold standard by an experiment then in progress. But the British Government invited a continuance in the meantime of the negotiations with the view to ascertain whether or not other great commercial nations besides France and the United States would wish to join the movement for an international agreement. The attempt to establish the gold standard in India has been a signal failure. Infinite distress has been caused to the people of India by the attempt, but success has not been accomplished. The Government of India will give rupees for gold sovereigns, which have been made a legal tender, but will not give gold sovereigns for rupees.

Lord George Hamilton, secretary of state for India, in council, in a dispatch to the governor-general of India, in council, dated July 25, 1899 (see Bimetallist of August, 1889, page 115), states the kind of gold standard it is proposed to establish in India. He says that the Indian committee concluded that steps should be taken to—

* * * Proceed with measures for the effective establishment of a gold standard. With this view they rocommend that the British sovereign be made a legal tender and a current coin in India, and that the Indian mints be thrown open to the unrestricted coinage of gold. But, while making this recommendation, the committee think it undesirable that any limit should be imposed on the amount for which rupees should be a legal tender: nor do they consider that you should undertake any obligation to pay gold in exchange for rupees.

Such so-called gold monometallism is a farce. India is a silver country and can not be forced either to use gold as money or to accept gold as the measure of commercial values, notwithstanding there is no self-government and the people have apparently no effective means of protecting themselves from wrongs which the home Government in London may attempt to inflict upon their starving oriental subjects. The public sentiment of England would, I believe, welcome another movement for the remonetization of silver and the reopening of the India mints for that purpose. Opinions have been widely expressed that the action of the British Government which terminated the negotiations of our envoys was a mistake. England suddenly finds herself in connection with her war of conquest against the Transvaal Republic obliged to borrow money, and if that war continues may soon become willing to enlarge the metallic money of the world through renewed negotiations for an international agreement.

NOW IS THE TIME TO FULFILL REPUBLICAN PLEDGES.

Why not, then, now renew efforts in the name of the United States for bimetallism? Why undertake by the first ten lines of this bill to strike one more blow at remonetization and falsify all the pledges which the Republican party and its leaders have been making in all these past years? None of the promises do I intend to recite during these remarks. They are well known to every person in this Chamber. The Senator from Iowa, the Senator from Rhode Island, and all the Republican Senators remember them too well. If those ten lines, without adequate qualification, become the law of the land, Senators will be sufficiently reminded of their pledges before the next Presidential canvass closes. Is it possible that we were all mistaken when these pledges were made? Were we blunderers, so ignorant of the principles of financial science that we loudly shouted over and over again for the remonetization of silver when gold monometallism was the true financial system? Is it not quite possible that we were right then and that we are wrong now if it is proposed to forever discard any idea of the remonetization of silver and to complete the work of establishing gold monometallism as the final money system for the United States and the world?

The Senator from Rhode Island says that it is not intended by this bill to reject the idea of international bimetallism if it ever becomes attainable. Then why not say so in this bill in unequivocal language? There exists the declaration of 1893, placed upon the statute book when the silver-purchasing clause of the Sherman Act of 1890 was repealed. Why not insert it in this bill if the Senator from Rhode Island means what he says? Are all the pledges of the Republican party, piled mountain high during the last twenty-five years, to be now reduced by Congress to a grudging minimum at a time when the President of the United States does not even mention the subject of the remonetization of silver in his annual message to Congress?

It seems plain to me that the declaration for gold in this bill is unwise, both in a business and political sense. There is no need of its enactment, no public demand for it, no business or financial condition which is to be helped by it. In 1873 the mints of the United States were closed to the coinage of silver dollars and no power on earth can open them to further coinage except the President and the two Houses of Congress, or the two Houses of Congress by a two-thirds majority without the President. The first ten lines of the bill are a work of supererogation, gratifying only to the gold class, who are bent upon increasing the value of their gold by legislation. Senators contend that the bill does not change existing law, but only reiterates existing law. If that be so, I say there is no necessity for the reiteration. And if I am wrong and there is such a necessity and the Senator from Rhode Island is sincere in saying that he does not intend to pronounce against bimetallism by international agreement, why not insert in this bill the declaration of the act of 1893. Here it is:

Act of Congress of November 1, 1893 (28 Stats., 4)—the repeal of the section of the act of July 14, 1890, providing for the purchase of silver bullion, with this addition:

"And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts; and it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in the payment of debts."

For the passage of this act of 1893 through the Senate on October 30, 1893, the following Senators voted: Messrs. ALDRICH, CULLOM, DAVIS, FRYE, GALLINGER, HALE, HAWLEY, HOAR, LODGE, MCMILLAN, PLATT, and PROCTOR; and there were paired in its favor Senators ALLISON, CHANDLER, and HANSBROUGH.

That is as much existing law as what the Senator proposes to reenact. The one thing is to be reiterated. Let the other also be reiterated. Can any fair refusal be given to this request? Does any Republican venture to say that the remonetization of silver is not desirable, even if it is attainable, which is the sum and substance of the programme of the Indianapolis convention?

As a party movement the enactment of gold monometallism would surely be a blunder. To what extent injury might result to the Republican party no one can now safely predict. That party is overwhelmingly strong, saved and strengthened by the war against Spain and the accelerated movement of the nation caused by that war and its incidents, with which the nineteenth century is to close. But no one has any right after the declaration pledging the Republican party to the promotion of the remonetization of silver, made in the national convention of 1896, to now change that position of the party. Only the national convention to be held in June next has the right to commit the party to gold monometallism. There being no need of a gold declaration in this bill, its adoption ought certainly to be deferred until that convention has declared the attitude of the party toward this question, in which it is willing to enter the canvass to end in November next. If that convention chooses to repudiate the whole past record of the party and declare for gold monometallism, discarding the possibility and desirability of the remonetization of silver, let it do so, but let the Republicans of Congress refrain from forestalling its action.

Gold monometallism is not our existing platform. It is contrary to every platform. The Senator from Rhode Island has just as much right to introduce a constitutional amendment striking the word silver out of the Constitution of the United States and further providing that the Government shall never issue legal-tender notes either in war or peace, and claim that the Republican party is committed to its adoption, as to introduce this bill, refuse to allow a declaration for bimetallism, and press it to its passage, asking in its favor, on party grounds, the votes of Republican Senators.

MAKE A STRONGER DECLARATION FOR INTERNATIONAL BIMETALLISM.

Mr. President, since the remarks I am now making were written the Senate Committee on Finance has somewhat changed its apparent position of hostility to bimetallism in any form or under any circumstances. This bill passed the House of Representatives on December 18, 1899, and on the next day was referred to the Senate committee, which immediately, on the same day, reported it to the Senate with the House provisions stricken out and a new Senate bill substituted. After forty-six days the committee, on February 6, reported the following as a new section:

That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism, provided the same be secured by concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver.

This concession of the Senate committee is gratifying, so far as it goes, to international bimetallists, but a more adequate recognition ought to be given by Congress of the national intention to remonetize silver. This does not even contain the six saving words of the platform of 1896 as to bimetallism: "Which we pledge ourselves to promote." Negatively only it states that the bill is not intended to place obstacles in the way of international bimetallism. What it should affirmatively state in conformity to previous declarations, pledges, and laws is this: That the United States, from tradition and interest, desire the remonetization of silver, the free coinage of both metals for use as standard money of the nations of the world, and demand continued efforts for the accomplishment of bimetallism until the double standard is once more the rule of all the commercial nations. Such a strong declaration might be satisfactory even to ardent bimetallists; but it would be much better to strike out the first ten lines of the bill, and then there will be nothing to explain to the American people.

A MORAL WRONG TO HUMANITY.

Mr. President, on the 23d day of January, while the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was speaking, I took occasion to declare that it seemed to me that the injury to be done to the world by gold monometallism might make the question of voting for or against this bill a moral one.

Professor Suess, of Vienna, in a paper in the appendixes (C. 93766, page 130) to the report of the late India commission, says:

Germany has loosened the old tie of gold and silver without anticipating the consequences. In the long run, the profits have without merit fallen to the bondholders and the losses without any fault to the debtors. The holders of foreign securities in England are in the first line responsible to the world for the continuation of this state of monetary affairs, so perilous also for themselves. I know well that personal interest is a very strong item; but national interest is a stronger item; and when national interest speaks, personal interest must rest silent. But the interest of humanity is a stronger item still; and even if national interest should eventually point the other way, which I contend is not the case for England, the common interest of humanity must prevail. A great nation, claiming to be a leading member of mankind, must feel this as a duty.

This most distinguished authority on the future of the precious metals I am willing to follow. If the words "a crime against humanity" do not please the gold class, I will here and now only say that gold monometallism is a moral wrong to humanity. Laying aside for the moment any consideration of the general injury to mankind from the continued progress toward the complete demonetization of silver, the injury done to the people of the silver nations of the world by the gold nations is utterly indefensible. To show this clearly I must again resort to a few figures.

The population of the world divided between gold-standard, silver-standard, and bimetallist countries is as follows:

Single gold standard countries	194,400,000
Single silver standard countries	975,900,000
Double-standard countries, including the United States	290,600,000
Total population	1,460,900,000

The population by continents is as follows:

	Single gold standard.	Double standard.	Silver standard.
Europe	158,100,000	109,100,000	97,100,000
Asia			843,800,000
Oceania	4,700,000	40,700,000
Africa	9,800,000	57,900,000	8,200,000
North America	6,400,000	72,700,000	15,700,000
South America	15,400,000	10,200,000	11,100,000
	194,400,000	290,600,000	975,900,000
	290,600,000
	975,900,000

[Muhleman's Monetary Systems of the World, 177.]

The gold and silver money in the world is divided among the nations as follows:

[Amounts stated in millions.]

	Silver.	Gold.
Single gold countries (population, 194,000,000)	$572.5	$1,782
Double-standard countries	1,910.8	1,883.3
Single silver standard countries	2,040.7	469.6
(Population, 1,266,000,000.)	3,951.5	2,353

Mr. Muhleman says (page 177):

It appears therefrom that less than one-seventh of the population of the world prefers the single gold standard, but this small proportion possesses three-sevenths of the monetary gold in the world. The chief representatives, moreover, of this class are Great Britain and Germany, the former the chief creditor nation of the world.

Here is a picture that shows the situation [exhibiting]. This is a little man 1 foot high representing 200,000,000 of the population owning eighteen hundred millions of the gold and six hundred millions of the silver of the world, and here is a large man 6 feet high and he represents 1,300,000,000 of people owning twenty-four hundred millions of the gold and four thousand millions of the silver. The cubes are made in accordance with the money value of the metal, not its bulk. To be accurate, the silver cubes should be sixteen times as large as the others. The little man says to the large man, "Let us settle what shall be our money." The large man says, "I supposed it was settled already, the gold and the silver in the world in the proportion of 15½ or 16 to 1." But the little man says, "I propose to unsettle it. Let us use gold alone as money. You have four-sevenths of it, and we only three-sevenths." "But," says the large man, "we have many people, 1,300,000,000. You have few, only 200,000,000. You will have $9 each; we will only have $2 each. If you must make a change and use only one metal, why not take the silver? You will have $3 each, and we will have $3 each." The little man says, "No; silver be condemned; we want gold." Then the large man says, "On the whole, we had better continue to use both gold and silver. You will have $12 each, and we will have $5 each." And I think at last the large man will have his way. He has not the cunning or activity of the little man, but he is patient and persistent and he will overcome the little man in the end.

For the reason that the pressure of the progress of the gold standard is helping to grind into poverty and starvation so many of the thirteen hundred millions of the world's people. China, with her 450,000,000 of inhabitants, has more than a thousand millions of silver. We do not know much about the interior of China, nor how much her people suffer from having one thousand millions of their silver reduced in value to four hundred millions.

ENGLAND'S CRUEL TREATMENT OF INDIA.

But we do know about India and her famine-oppressed myriads. Too much can not be said about the effect of continued progress toward the universal adoption of the gold standard upon the condition of her people. Three years ago there was a famine, and the sympathies of the benevolent men and women of the whole world were enlisted in behalf of the starving millions. Grain was donated largely in the United States to send to their relief, and there was preparation for chartering ships in which to transport the food. Shortly it appeared, however, that there was no scarcity of grain in the markets of India.

The misfortune of the people was that they had no money with which to buy it, their lack of money being largely caused by the fall in value not merely of the coined rupees, but of the millions invested by the people in silver ornaments and in silver bullion in other forms. So the wiser course was pursued as to many of the American contributions—that of selling the grain which was donated and remitting the money instead thereof to India. Manifestly, if there were $2,000,000,000 in coin and silver bullion and ornaments in India when her mints were closed in 1893, there was a shrinkage of the value of the money of India to the amount of a thousand millions of dollars. There is abundant evidence to show the distress caused by this depreciation in the value of the silver of India.

There seems to be some question about the amount of silver in India. The Director of the Mint estimates it at five hundred and sixty-eight million four hundred thousand. Mr. Muhleman, in the Monetary Systems of the World, page 172, as far back as 1893-94, estimated the full silver of India as $900,000,000. Interrupting the speech of the senior Senator from Colorado on January 23, 1900, I made the following statement as to the amount of silver in the form of ornaments possessed by the people of India:

In an article in the New York Tribune of February 8, 1897, signed "I. N. F.," Mr. Ford, describing the condition at that time of the Indian peasantry, says:

"Sir Lepel Griffin states, on the authority of Mr. Lesley Probyn, that the amount of silver in the possession of the Indian peasantry in the form of ornaments is 1,312,500,000 ounces."

Of course, at $1.29 an ounce, that would be more than $1,500,000,000 in ornaments.

The following statement, by Mr. Moreton Frewen, is taken from the Financial News of January 3, 1900, and was incorporated in speech of the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] on January 23, 1900:

A serious famine has again overtaken some millions of our fellow-subjects in India, and the public are appealed to for funds to assist the Government of India to fulfill its duties. What is wanted is not food, but money to buy food. * * * The closing of the mint involves the death, after cruel suffering, of our fellow subjects, and their real famine reserve fund, accumulated during centuries, is in their ornaments and their hoards of silver bullion. Let me once again quote the evidence of an eyewitness, Mr. Forbes Mitchell, a well-known Calcutta merchant.

Mr. Mitchell wrote to me during the last famine that he had seen a peasant from one of the worst famine districts arrive in Allahabad with bangles and other ornaments which, had the mints been open, would have coined into 1,980 rupees; but the mints were closed and accordingly this poor man had to part with his little hoard of uncoined silver for 600 rupees; so that the closing of the mints took from this one man 1,380 rupees, and reduced this famine fund in a village where people were dying of starvation by just that amount. * * * Well did Mr. David Yule, the president of the Bank of Calcutta, declare of this amazing trick: "Enforced scarcity of money is the only hope on which the famine-begetting gold standard depends. To become wealthy, the government of India is endeavoring to render itself and its trading community destitute. * * *

Mr. Frewen also, in the same article, shows the injury to the people of Russia in connection with the famine of the year 1897-98, made more severe by the attempt to adopt the gold standard:

Let me refer the Indian government, struggling to-day with famine, to an interesting analogy. At the session of the agricultural congress of the nine governments of central Russia, at Orel, in May of last year, M. Georges Boutmy, of Odessa, said of Russia's variation from her silver standard:

"During the five years which preceded the famine of the year 1897-98 Russia exported 563,000,000 poods more and obtained in exchange 84,000,000 roubles less than during the five years which preceded the famine of the year 1891-92. If we had kept our legitimate silver standard, these 563,000,000 poods of food and 84,000,000 roubles, lost to us through the gold standard, would have been saved to us and would have sufficed to spare Russia the frightful famine which devastated actually nineteen provinces, with a population of 30,000,000, cruelly decimated by the typhus and by the scurvy, those satellites of famine. The famine of 1891 claimed 656,000 human victims. These hundreds of thousands of men who were swept off by actual famine are the human sacrifices sacrificed to the golden calf by the fanaticism of its worshipers."

The London Bimetallist for August, 1899 (page 110), has the following statement of the case:

The present unhappy prospects in India should be a spur to our Government in the matter. We have alluded to the possible political dangers involved in the existing conditions. We need scarcely say that we refer to the uncoined silver savings of the natives of India. Though the report of the currency committee studiously avoided all reference to the subject, and though it was also, singular to say, ignored in the debate in Parliament on the Indian budget, it is impossible to deny that a grave hardship is inflicted upon the natives so long as the Indian mints are closed to the free coinage of silver. The great bulk of their savings is in silver ornaments, a large percentage of these being made of melted rupees, and whereas while the mints were open they were salable in times of stress at, approximately, weight for weight in rupees. During the last famine in many cases they were only realizable at about 50 per cent of their weight in rupees.

The amount involved is enormous, the government estimate being Rs. 300,000,000 (that is three hundred millions sterling at the old rate of exchange), while it was stated in evidence to the committee that native financiers of experience put the amount as high as Rs. 1,000,000,000. At a time when India is threatened with a famine, which may prove to be one of the worst of the century, we are sure that it will appeal to Lord George Hamilton and the government, as much on the ground of humanity as of high policy, that if they can, by an international agreement, while securing stability in the gold value of the rupee, reopen the mints to silver, and so restore the rupee value of the natives' savings which they lost by the recent legislation, it would not only be an "ideal settlement," but ideal statesmanship as well.

Mr. J. E. Abbott, in a letter dated New York, January 30, 1900, published in the New York Tribune of January 31, 1900, under the heading "A famine fund for India," makes the following statement:

Since the official declaration of famine in India by Lord Curzon three months ago, the distress has increased by strides and bounds. The famine area has increased so that, instead of 30,000,000, now 52,000,000 persons are involved. Three months ago 400,000 were on relief works, now 3,500,000. The emaciated and "living skeletons" were only occasionally seen then; they are now seen by the thousands. The number of such will soon rise to the hundred thousands. The terrible suffering of childhood has now become common. * * *

Mr. W. T. Stead, discussing "The perilous position of England" in the Review of Reviews for February, 1900, says:

FAMINE-STRICKEN INDIA.

While we are wasting the resources of our people in waging a wanton war in South Africa, the cry of famine-stricken India falls upon deaf ears. According to the latest information the scarcity of food extends over an area twice as large as France and affects a population of over 50,000,000. More than one-half of these are British subjects. At present 2,000,000 are kept from absolutely dying of starvation by the weekly dole of the Indian government; but the number is said to be increasing at the rate of 250,000 a week. The white man's burden becomes tangible and visible to us when we have to raise £350,000 a month to "fill full the mouth of famine." According to competent local authorities the famine is even greater than that which called forth the charity of England three years ago.

The cruel treatment thus inflicted by the British home Government to enrich the 30,000,000 people of the British Islands at the cost of the 300,000,000 British subjects in India should awaken the continued efforts of bimetallists the world over, and the United States should be no party to the terrible chastisements which are being imposed upon a people who have no self-government whatever, and therefore can not resist the cruelty with which the gold class is now treating them.

"I WANT THE DOUBLE STANDARD."

Mr. President, it is with sincere regret that I differ so radically from so many of my political associates in this body. But my convictions of duty will not allow me to do otherwise. I have not abandoned the faith of the fathers. I stand upon the ancient ways. "I want the double standard." So do thirteen hundred millions of the people of this world of ours, while only 200,000,000 want the single gold standard. We want the real money of the world to be $8,000,000,000 in coin. They want it to be only $4,000,000,000. The difference means injustice, injury, suffering, and distress to millions of God's poor people the world over, while the gold class is to wax fat at the cost of their helpless victims.

The Republican party ought not to do any such grievous wrong. I entreat its leaders not to burden us with gold monometallism, but to renew in unmistakable language our oft-repeated pledges to remonetize silver. Let us not justify the aspersion lately cast upon us by Mr. Bryan when he said he did not believe that the Republicans would hold out international bimetallism in their platform of 1900, and that he expected to see their platform declare unequivocally for the gold standard.

He further said:

Thousands of votes went to the Republican candidates in 1896 on their promise to do everything possible to bring about bimetallism by international agreement. The falsity of that pretense was demonstrated early in the present Administration. I do not think they will try the same trick again, but if they do they will not succeed in fooling very many people by it.

Let us repel this charge as unjust and untrue by reaffirming the oft-proclaimed principle of our party and the ever-present desire of our people, that both gold and silver shall be the standard money of the nation. If we are thus true to our traditions and to the wishes of our constituents, we shall reelect our gracious and patriotic President by popular and electoral majorities greater than any President has ever received. Can we afford, by the passage of the needless first ten lines of this bill, without sufficient qualification, to add to the chances of his defeat?

"GOLD AND GLORY."

The gifted Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] is said to have designed for the Republican party a new campaign motto for 1900: "Gold and Glory." The alliteration is pleasing. It will look finely on gilded banners, and will doubtless lead to victory. But if the word "gold" means gold monometallism, it will be necessary for the golden-tongued orators of the party to expatiate with marvelous eloquence over the glory to the flag coming from the war with Spain, in order to overcome the many evil effects at the polls in November of the deep damnation of the destruction by legislation of half the metallic money of the nations of the earth.

Mr. President, thou canst not say I did it!

Mr. STEWART. If there is no one else to speak immediately, I will proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] has previously given notice of his intention to speak at this time.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the pending bill, which represents the financial policy of the present Administration, touches three great subjects in a way to do harm to the interests of the masses of the people. These subjects are, first, the outstanding legal-tender currency; second, national banks; and third, Government bonds. Whether you take the House bill or the Senate bill, the same harmful result will be accomplished, and it may be treated in advance as a certainty that the conference bill which will come out of whatever differences may exist in the bills passed by the House and the Senate will do well the purpose which seems to be the main object of both bills—that is, to refund our entire national debt in long-time gold bonds, give greater monopoly and surer perpetuity to national banks, and destroy all prospect of bimetallism so far as the power of the Republican party can accomplish that result.

THE ENDLESS CHAIN.

The only sound reason which any fair man can discover in the clamor which has been raised for amending our financial system arises out of the redemption of the outstanding greenback and Treasury notes.

It is familiar history how, during the Cleveland Administration, these notes were used to obtain gold for speculative purposes in New York. Whenever the big operators of that city found that there was more demand for gold in Europe than in the United States they collected together greenbacks and Treasury notes and called on our Treasury to furnish them gold coin. In this way the gold reserve in the United States Treasury was run down. The President then ordered bonds to be sold to obtain gold, and this gold was then drawn out again by these New York speculators. New bonds had to be sold to get it back, and four different times the Government of the United States went through the seemingly ridiculous but terribly serious operation of selling bonds to get gold. An increase of $262,000,000 in our bonded debt was loaded on the American people as a perpetual memorial of the folly of the financial policy which then existed, and now exists, in the United States of America.

This was the so-called "endless chain."

Its operation can be corrected, and I wonder that the Republican party in the heyday of its power does not now possess the boldness to take up this question for settlement in an effective method. It can be settled in several ways. If the Government of the United States would exercise its plain option to pay these greenbacks and Treasury notes in silver coin, the door would be closed on gold speculators who want to ship gold abroad or force the Government to buy it back again. Or if silver enough were coined to replace these greenback and Treasury notes, they could be removed from active circulation by the introduction of silver certificates, and thus the instrumentalities by which the gold speculators poached upon the taxpayers of the United States would be destroyed. Or, third, these greenbacks and notes could be retired by the issuance of United States bonds, and thus the danger of future drains upon our Treasury, such as happened during the Cleveland Administration, avoided and the terrors of contraction boldly embraced. This last expedient would, in my judgment, prove a deplorable method of relief, and I would not vote for it, but it is really what the great financial interests which put Mr. McKinley in the Presidency desire, and it is what the Republican party would do if it dared to be candid with the people.

But instead of going directly to the seat of this Treasury disorder, which has existed and may exist again, in some ready, good method, or even a bold, bad method, the Republican party seeks to reach the same result in a roundabout way. It fears to encounter the frowns of its patrons by recognizing silver and thus cutting the endless chain on the one hand, and it quails under the possible wrath of the people which would come from the outright retirement of the greenbacks on the other. So that party now seeks to satisfy the magnates who build up its campaign funds by giving them the substance of what they want and to delude the good people who constitute a large part of its voting strength by leaving them the shadow of their old currency system.

A currency bill such as is finally decided by the Republican leaders to be as near what the gold trust wants as the Republican voters will stand is sure to pass at this session of Congress. Whether it be the House bill or the Senate bill, it will fix upon the statute books the proposition that all the outstanding greenbacks, amounting to $346,000,000, issued at a time when they were hardly worth 50 cents on the dollar in gold or silver, and $93,518,280 in Treasury notes, which were issued to buy silver, shall hereafter be payable in gold alone.

THE NEXT STEP.

I look, too, for the next step to be a Treasury ruling that the existing silver dollars and silver certificates shall be redeemed in gold. I know that it is denied by the chairman of the Finance Committee that such a purpose exists, but the language of the bill is vague on this subject, and there seems to be no good reason for increasing the gold reserve to $150,000,000, unless an additional charge upon it is contemplated. It will be remembered that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, suggested that it be made mandatory upon the Treasury Department to so pay and receive the two kinds of money—silver and gold—as to maintain their parity under all conditions.

MORE POWER FOR LARGE BANKS.

But not content with fixing a gold redemption for all the outstanding legal-tender currency, the framers of the pending bill have taken up the question of national banks and reported a measure which will greatly strengthen the hold of those institutions upon the financial destinies of the American people. While many other interests in this country may be injuriously affected by the proposed legislation, one thing is certain, the national banking interest will be specifically and directly benefited.

Under the existing law national banks are permitted to deposit United States bonds with the Treasurer of the United States and receive back 90 per cent in circulating notes. In this way a capitalist, who always seeks Government securities as affording the greatest amount of safety and the least amount of trouble in management, buys United States bonds, which bring him a current interest, leaves them in the vaults of the Treasury, which he would ordinarily be glad to do for safe-keeping, and on every $100 worth of bonds draws out $90 in national-bank notes, which he loans to his customers. Thus at the same time the national banker is drawing interest on the $100 invested in the bond and on $90 of the same $100, which he has loaned again.

This has for years been pointed out as a most extraordinary privilege conferred on a particular class of the community, and it has been defended on the ground that while it gave great gain to the banker it lost nothing to the Government, but indirectly resulted in collecting a tax on the bond by means of the law which puts a tax on the circulation of national banks. But the pending bill increases this extraordinary privilege by authorizing national banks to draw out currency to the face amount of their bonds. Thus we see that a 10 per cent bonus is immediately granted to every national banker depositing bonds with the United States Treasury.

Now, if the bill stopped here, it might be argued that an expansion of the currency would to some extent ensue by reason of the 10 per cent addition to the amount of outstanding national-bank notes; and that a tax on these bank notes would be collected to assist the Government in defraying the expenses of the national-banking system. But the bill goes on to provide that the tax upon all national-bank notes issued upon the new bonds provided for shall be reduced by one-half, and as all the outstanding bonds may be exchanged for these new bonds, we have here an opportunity afforded to cut down by one-half the taxation on all national-bank notes now outstanding in the United States.

Let us take some specific examples to show the operations of this bill.

The American Exchange National Bank of New York, according to the last published statement of the Comptroller of the Currency, had on deposit with the Treasury to secure circulation $4,450,000 in United States bonds. This would authorize a bank-note issue of $4,005,000.

When the pending bill goes into operation, this bank will have the privilege of issuing at one time—immediately—$445,000 more bank notes than now; and if it avails itself of the opportunity to exchange its bonds as the bill allows, its tax on circulation will be reduced by nearly $20,000 a year.

I have no prejudice against national banking associations. Under our system it is a legitimate form of business operation, and those who put their money into these corporations have a perfect right to do so. If there is any reform necessary in the national banking laws, it would seem to be to diminish the minimum fixed for capital stock, so that the people of small towns throughout the country can share in the commercial facilities afforded by these organizations. The House bill contains such a provision, but the Senate amendment has stricken it out.

I can not believe that any further encouragement is needed to stimulate the organization of large banks in great cities. The bonds upon which these national banks operate now have imperial privileges enough. First, they are exempt from all forms of taxation, State, county, and municipal. Second, they can be used as a basis for procuring incorporated banking facilities. In some States that is the only way a bank can be incorporated. Third, national banks alone can issue currency upon Government bonds. And now it is proposed to give a fourth privilege—first, by allowing them to issue 10 per cent more currency than they have heretofore been permitted to do, and, second, to reduce their taxation.

But while this is going on, strange to say, not the slightest check is put upon the existing power enjoyed by national banks to withdraw their currency whenever they desire to do so, and in this way their power to expand or contract the circulating medium, which should be under control of Government, is left in unchecked authority.

GOLD BONDS.

A third feature of the pending bill is that which makes all outstanding United States bonds payable specifically in gold, and the Senate amendment authorizing all existing United States bonds to be refunded in thirty-year bonds, specifically payable on their face, principal and interest, in gold coin of the present standard value.

I had occasion in a speech which I made January 28, 1898, on the Teller resolution to give a copy of each class of United States bonds then outstanding. I showed that each set of these bonds were payable on their face "in coin of the standard value of the United States on July 14, 1870," and that on July 14, 1870, the silver dollar of 412½ grains was the standard of value and a full legal tender in the United States. Since that time $198,000,000 bonds have been issued to carry on expenses of the Spanish war, but they are payable on their face in coin. So that like the other bonds they can be paid in good American money—either silver or gold.

The act of 1869 (section 3693, U. S. Revised Statutes), which fixed the right of bondholders to demand coin on their bonds, recognized gold and silver as the coin referred to in our bond issues, and it is absolutely clear in law and morals that the United States have the right to pay all their public obligations in either gold or silver coin. This bill takes away that option and makes every United States bond payable in gold.

In the same speech to which I have referred I said:

> For more than twenty years there has been a systematic, unrelenting purpose on the part of the capitalists of the world to make the bonds of the United States payable in gold only, in spite of the explicit terms contained in these bonds and the wishes and interests of the American people.

The time has now come for carrying out this long-deferred plan. The bonded debt of the United States is $1,046,010,920, and these bonds, which have heretofore been payable in one of two sorts of standard money, are hereafter to be paid in gold alone. Not one dime of recompense is given to the taxpayers of the United States for thus making harder and heavier their Government obligations.

While Mr. Cleveland was President, he issued $62,000,000 of 4 per cent bonds payable in coin at one time and made a contract with the purchasers that he might replace these bonds with 3 per cent bonds payable in gold.

On February 8, 1895, he sent a message to Congress asking for authority to make the substitution, and showed how the Government would be saved $16,174,770 by the exchange. Yet Congress refused to allow the bonds to be made payable in gold. Now these self-same bonds on which the people of the United States lost $16,000,000 in order to retain the privilege of paying them in either gold or silver are to be made payable in gold by this bill without a cent of charge to the bondholders.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not by the Senate bill.

Mr. CHILTON. Well, the House bill certainly does. I will say in this connection that the House bill is the bill which is universally expected to become the law on that subject. When we come to discuss the conference report, of course we will see the exact complexion of the bill agreed to and to be put upon its passage. Even under the Senate bill the same result is achieved—for if you give every outstanding bondholder the right to exchange existing bonds for bonds that on their face are payable in gold, it is as bad as if you said in so many words that the outstanding bonds should be so payable.

It is true, Mr. President, that these great financial changes are in progress of completion without arousing that degree of resentment among the people that the circumstances demand. It is one of the infirmities of operating a great government that its transactions extend over such long periods of time that the people do not feel enough of the burden at any particular moment to stimulate them to energetic action. Such a thing as a thirty-year bond is practically unknown in the private transactions of the common people. Perhaps not more than 25 per cent of the men who are voters in 1900 will be alive in 1930.

Again, the operations of the United States Government are so far distant from the activities of the common people that it is hard to fix their attention on bond issues and other problems of that sort in the settlement of which each individual voter has so small a share; but I have hopes, sir, that there will be a freshening and concentration of the public interest upon the policy of the Republican party as reflected in this bill.

NEW BONDS.

I have addressed myself to the effects of this bill upon the existing obligations of the United States Government; but under the power conferred by it upon the Secretary of the Treasury our existing obligations may be enormously increased in carrying out the perpetual task of keeping up the gold reserve. This gold reserve, which has heretofore been $100,000,000 by regulation of the Treasury, is now to be made $150,000,000 by law. Thus $50,000,000 more gold is to be withdrawn from circulation and piled up in the vaults of the Treasury.

Whenever this gold reserve is reduced as described in the bill the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue bonds to rebuild it, and this process can be repeated indefinitely. I for one do not believe in vesting the discretion of issuing United States bonds in unlimited amount in any functionary whatever. In the first place, I believe that the policy which requires a gold reserve ought to be abandoned, and, in the second place, that there should be some limit upon the power to issue bonds—make it $100,000,000, $200,000,000, or even $500,000,000.

When we came to issue bonds to carry on the Spanish war, it was deemed wise to put a limitation on the right to issue bonds so that not more than $400,000,000 should be issued without further authorization on the part of Congress, and the same caution should be exercised in this case.

I regard it as a false policy of government to give any one man such absolute control of the burdens which may be imposed on the people. I think a responsibility so serious, so far-reaching, so liable to abuse, should be retained in the hands of the representatives of the people, and it is no answer to say that such vast liberty of action has been conferred in former years.

The operations of our Treasury Department are in my judgment unduly subordinated to the interests of the moneyed friends of the party in power, and legislation should be had to narrow rather than enlarge the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Of course I know, Mr. President, that the passage of this bill is foreordained. The Republican party, having control of the Senate and House of Representatives, does not propose to risk the fate of another election, when possibly the choice of a Democratic House or President may checkmate its plans.

And when this bill becomes a law the pathway to correcting its hardships will be long and difficult. Bimetallism may come through the ascendancy of the Democratic party, but even then we will have new perplexities thrust into our faces by the claim set up that the bonds and outstanding obligations of the Government have been made payable in gold alone.

Thirty years will be a long time in rolling round, and some of the evils which this bill will force on the people can not sooner be stricken from their limbs even if great political changes are wrought in the coming elections; but much can be done to produce a change of policies by a change of parties in this country, and the fight for real bimetallism will go on.

If it be necessary to provide security against future emergencies such as those which beset the Cleveland Administration, let the Republican party do that manfully. But why come now and give lower taxes to national bankers alone of all the classes? Why discredit our existing silver dollars by destroying their redemption power? Why give greater value to national bonds alone of all sorts of property in this country.

The Republican leaders are gleeful that a time has come when they can carry out their plans. They boast themselves that prosperity abounds in the days of their power; that the silver question is dead; that vast annexations and victorious wars are the triumphs of the McKinley Administration.

But let it not be forgotten that there are triumphs and final triumphs in the progress of civilization. Appearances can not change the inevitable tendencies of nature. Good prices which have come to the cotton raiser and the wheat raiser by short crops and the gold discoveries of the last few years can not last when the mines have failed and good crops come again.

Such prosperity as we see has followed the course of nature, and has demonstrated the correctness of the Democratic theory that a greater money supply was needed to end hard times. It has not been scattered from the imperial chariot of the Republican party as the bounty of its progress.

Time and trial will test your policies and show their fatal weakness.

If American statesmen had not looked ahead, they might have thought while the abundance of the California gold discoveries were flushing on the country that a time had come to finally discard silver, but ten years was enough to show the waning impetus of these golden Pacific streams.

If American statesmen would look ahead now, they may see beyond this year or the next year good crops on our side of the ocean and the other, with gold fields which live only in memory and a people struggling with disaster which neither personal energy nor nature's plenty can lift off their shoulders in the face of a diminishing supply of money.

No man can tell what the cotton crop of the South will be this year, nor the wheat supply of the Old World. No man can tell how much the world's gold production will increase or diminish. I would not put my country helpless upon the sea of these chances. I would hold for the people sacredly all the opportunities of the situation.

I will not help by my vote to take $50,000,000 more of gold out of the channels of circulation and pile it up in the Treasury as a reserve, or to give national banks more power to control the volume of circulation than they now possess, or to saddle upon the taxpayers of the Union the promise to pay in gold coin more than a billion dollars of bonds which they can now pay in either silver or gold.

I will not be one of those to take the final step—possibly the step which can never be retraced—to force this nation into league with England and other monarchies of the Old World, which have long struggled to erect their single gold standard to measure the industrial opportunities of mankind.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, in the discussion of the amendment before the Senate I presume it is admissible to discuss the Senate bill and the House bill, with a view, perhaps, to a new bill which may come from the conference committee. As was said by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] a moment ago, it seems to be the general wish of that part of the press that belongs to the monometallists that the House bill should be preferred above the Senate bill, and the House bill comes to us indorsed by the unanimous vote of the Republicans in that body.

The contributions to this discussion in the House have been very full, and, in my judgment, very able; and in this body this particular bill has by sections been so keenly analyzed by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] and by other Senators, who carefully examined its provisions, and it has been so finely delineated by the brilliant speech of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] this morning, that I feel it is almost a superfluous work in me to attempt to do anything in the way of an elucidation or investigation of the particular measure itself.

I desire to state also that I seize this opportunity because the floor was unoccupied, and without any special preparation for the task that I have undertaken. I think it better, then, Mr. President, in view of the arguments in detail which have been made on this special measure, that I should confine myself in the few remarks I shall make to the general underlying principles of the whole question of the money system.

It is sometimes necessary to repeat old, trite things. We have not yet lost the habit of reading, on the Fourth of July, the Declaration of Independence, although that great instrument it is fashionable now in some quarters to almost ignore and to decry. We make arrangements to have read from that desk Washington's Farewell Address to his countrymen, which I am sorry to say has fallen into disrepute and is considered now entirely out of date by some.

The Senator from New Hampshire said very well that the moral side of this question had not been debated. I desire to say now, corroborating that remark, that it never has yet been debated in this body or the other House or on the stump. Those gentlemen who have advocated monometallism have never yet attempted to debate the moral side of it. I find that in debating other questions quite as important as this, in other words, the question which in my mind leads to imperialism, to the substitution of force for consent in our frame of government, the attempt has been made to either ignore it or to make such argument as divest governments of all moral obligation whatever.

Mr. President, I may be pardoned if I to-day repeat what has so often been better said that may bring out the philosophy of monometallism. Let me reveal the reasons why it was ever undertaken at all by any government. It is hardly necessary to say that, as far as we are concerned, in the United States there was no resolution or plank in any party's platform, either in national, State, county, or district, or in a ward meeting, that requested the United States Congress to demonetize silver.

There was, as I recollect, no argument in any newspaper demanding it. No communication by letter or petition or memorial came to either House of Congress asking that one of these metals of the Constitution should be divested of its money power. But the whole secret of the business is in that quotation from Brooks Adams's great work on the Law of Civilization and Decay, which was read just now by the Senator from New Hampshire.

I may add to that a prediction made by the man whom I shall consider as the real father of the independence of this country, Samuel Adams, of Massachusetts, the only man who had the mind bold and original and daring enough to insist that these colonies should be a free and independent nation, when his great colleagues in the service of his country were sending humble petitions to the throne of the King of England declaring themselves his most loyal and obedient subjects and denying that they desired to shake off allegiance to him, but that they simply wanted representation with the taxation. Sam Adams, in a letter to Richard Henry Lee during the time when the Constitution was being discussed before ratification by the several States, made this remark:

> Our people have prepared a frame of government suitable to their wants. They are now poor and simple and they love liberty, but I fear the time will come when they will grow rich and when wealth will be preferred to freedom.

Mr. President, that time has come. In Rome it was the greatest crime known to the law to despair of the republic. But it seems to me the prediction of Sam Adams is being fulfilled to-day, in a measure, in the culmination probably of the series of measures that have been put in force by the Republican party since they have controlled national legislation.

Well, what was the underlying motive that led to the demonetization anywhere? The fact was not concealed in its genesis as it is to-day. There was no attempt whatever at disguise when the movement began. It began when the gold fields of Australia, of California, and of Siberia were opening up to the world undreamed masses of gold. When this was discovered such men as De Quincey, the prince of English classicists, declared that gold by its mere abundance was becoming a base metal; and he wrote that great essay called "California," in which he demonstrated that it was the duty of England to demonetize gold and make silver the sole standard of value.

Chevalier, in France, the profoundest and acutest thinker who has ever written upon this subject upon that side of the question, produced an irrefutable argument, in which no critic has yet been able to find a flaw, in which he argued that gold was becoming too abundant to be the standard and measure of value and that it should be demonetized and silver declared the sole standard of value. There were many great writers upon this subject, all using the same argument, during the abundance of gold, for its demonetization and the substitution of silver as the single standard. This will not be denied by anybody.

I have said that the arguments of these writers, of these publicists, and of these public men, were irrefutable, and they were, because the logic was perfect, if you admit the premise. But the premise was false. They laid down the foundation for a public policy that was oppressive to the great masses of the people, and it simply helped only the class who need no legislation in their behalf.

Well, what was the reason? Not only was it detailed in the writings with which the members of the Senate are familiar, but it was clearly and tersely stated by a commission appointed by the French Government for the purpose of inquiring into the subject. You will recollect the French commission of inquiry in 1868, I think that was the date. When they came to their conclusion, after a laborious session, they declared that the abundance of the precious metals, not naming either silver or gold, was depreciating the purchasing power of money (which is its value), for the word value in commercial and financial sense has no other meaning than the purchasing power of the thing spoken of.

This commission declared that on account of the abundance of the two metals the products, the services of men, were bringing a higher price; that the purchasing power of gold and silver had declined, which worked a great injustice to whom, Mr. President? To the bondholders, to the annuity holders, to the wealthy who enjoyed a fixed income; and no other class was mentioned. Nothing was said of the untold millions of human beings who created wealth; nothing of the service of those who had no independent fixed income; but only those who enjoyed a fixed income from the four sources which they mentioned.

They said that as it was the duty of the Government to fix the weight and value of metals, it was also their duty to protect this class from the depreciation of the purchasing power of their income, and this argument met its acknowledgment. These gentlemen did not say they wanted gold demonetized; they did not say they wanted silver demonetized. As a matter of fact, they were absolutely indifferent whether gold or silver was demonetized. It must be, however, to meet their views—one or the other metals. There is not an honest monometallist in the world who understands what his faith is who would care to-day a solitary straw whether gold or silver was the standard and measure of value of the world.

I will venture this prediction, that if the gold production of the world increases for five years in the same ratio that it has in the past five years, the monometallists will begin to ask for the demonetization of gold and the remonetization of silver. Chevalier and his colaborers called for the demonetization of gold and making silver the sole standard and measure of value, and the response came from almost half the nations of Europe. Holland demonetized gold and made silver the standard. The three Scandinavian states did that. The little congeric of German states that now constitute the German Empire did that. Austria-Hungary did that.

Then why did the scheme fail? Simply because the United States of America and France insisted upon bimetallism, and Great Britain, that went, under Lord Liverpool's government, to the single gold standard in 1816, when she did not have any gold or any silver and never made specie payment for years after, did it at the behest and command of the bondholders of England, that increased in such strength on account of the indebtedness, that amounted to about $5,000,000,000, caused by the Napoleonic war, when Pitt was maintaining that magnificent coalition against Napoleon by subsidizing every nation in Europe and putting their armies in the field.

When it was found impossible to make all nations adopt the silver standard, and when silver began to be produced in great quantities to correspond with that of gold, and it exceeded in some years, then these gentlemen changed their tactics, and the same men and the same arguments were used for the demonetization of silver that had been before used for the demonetization of gold, and with perfect consistency, when you consider that the sole object was to reduce the volume of the money of the world and thereby increase its value or purchasing power, and of course by the same act reducing the value of the products of the world and the services of mankind.

That was the motive, the reason why. I want to make this observation, that I do not believe any country has ever yet demonetized a metal until the bondholders, the people who enjoyed fixed incomes, demanded it. The public certificates of indebtedness in the world amount to $32,000,000,000 according to the statisticians, England holding over $10,000,000,000 of them. Whenever they would get strong enough anywhere in any country to control legislation, immediately there has been a demonetization of one or the other metals with always the same end in view, that the money volume shall be contracted and that their income shall be increased in the purchasing power in order to give them an absolute mastery over the labor of mankind.

Now, this was the reason. We have had what our friends on the other side claim to be a wave of prosperity. It was a long time coming. It was like a child born out of due season. It did not come immediately upon the fixing of the gold standard by the late legislation. When did it come, Mr. President? It came when the untold riches of gold were exploited all over the world, with the Klondike and the Rand and the Ural Mountains and Colorado becoming a great gold State instead of a great silver State. It was when these great sums that amounted to $382,000,000 in the year 1898 had been brought from the mines of the world, producing a prodigious sum which has been mentioned—I forget the exact figure given by the Senator from New Hampshire a few moments ago—but amounting to over $1,200,000,000 of precious metals in five years. In other words, more gold was produced in those five years alone than had been produced of gold and silver in the five years preceding that period.

Of course this tremendous influx of precious metals has done what? It has raised the price of things a little, but it has done more than that. It has verified all the predictions made by bimetallists in every single campaign since silver was demonetized, every single one of them, because we have always insisted, not that there was any inherent power in the white metal to lift up the price of products, that there was any particular virtue in that which made it more valuable than gold, but that it was the quantity, the quantity and volume of money, the money of redemption, the basic money of the country—not of this alone, but of all the commercial countries of the world—that would determine the value of things.

We have had scarcity of money and the constant sinking of prices, resulting in great numbers of men out of employment; for in the contraction of all the fields of industry and energetic operation there was of course the elimination here and there of men who sought labor that they might put bread in the mouths of wives and children. We demanded more money, and the only way we thought of, taking the records of the mints and other sources of information concerning the production of gold annually, was to remonetize silver, the money of the Constitution, equal with gold, and that was denied to us.

The quantitative theory of money was asserted before the birth of Christ by Aristotle, and it has been repeated by every considerable writer on the subject of finance and the money question since—by Locke, by John Stuart Mill, by Sir James Graham, by Ricardo, by everybody, even by monometallists like Walter Stanley Jevons and Mr. Robert Giffen, the editor of the Economist. All of them held that the quantitative theory of money was true. While professing it in their platforms, the Republican orators always denied it upon the stump, and we heard for the first time of the qualitative theory. If anything has been established it is the quantitative theory of money.

But there are other things beside this output of precious metals. One is, they had a famine throughout the world. It happened but three years ago. There was in the United States an extraordinary crop of wheat. There was also a falling off in the production of wheat in that vast Empire of Russia to such an extent that an imperial ukase forbade its exportation, and an utter failure in India, which induced that famine of which the Senator from New Hampshire read such a pathetic account in his speech, which shows that by legislation favoring the gold standard people had been starved to death in India just as effectually as were the pacificos of Cuba under the reconcentration order of Captain-General Weyler. In other words, legislation had accomplished in one continent what arms had done in another. It had worked starvation and death among millions of human beings.

Then, Mr. President, there was a failure in Australia, and Australia began to import instead of exporting. There was a failure in the Argentine Republic which had reached an exportation prior to that time of 76,000,000 bushels annually. There was a failure in the great wheat-producing country of France of 130,000,000 bushels. There was a failure in the wheat product of Great Britain, the great importing nation of breadstuffs, of 80,000,000 bushels.

In other words, it seems that throughout the earth there was a famine in wheat, and the United States was full of wheat, and of course the price of wheat went up, because in every instance the value of a thing depends upon its supply and its demand. That brought into our country a tremendous quantity of money. Then we had this enormous balance in our favor which made its the year before last the greatest exporting nation of the world. In one year the balance in our favor reached $626,000,000.

All these things had their effect. There was a stimulus in prices, and the predictions of the silver men or bimetallists were verified by the facts that exist to-day in the knowledge of every man in this Chamber.

We said if you had more money the wheels of enterprise would move anew and with greater quickness; that there would be more enterprise; that new roads would be built, new mines would be opened, new canals would be constructed, new factories would go up, and that a new acreage would be cultivated in the great staples of the country like wheat, tobacco, sugar, and cotton. All this has been verified. The army of tramps has been cut down everywhere. Capital is now seeking labor, and not labor seeking employment from capital, as it was in the days of depression before this change came. The increased production of the precious metals and this concatenation of circumstances has driven the world here for its supply of breadstuffs, and hence this improvement.

The question is, Will this condition of prosperity be permanent? It will be permanent, Mr. President, in my opinion, if the gold production and silver production increase; but at the same time it teaches a lesson that no man can disregard, which is that, if the theory of the bimetallists had been put in practical operation by legislation, the era of depression to which I have referred—the era of falling prices, of labor without employment, of languishing industry, of the circumscription of the fields of activity and energy—would never have existed, and the country, instead of going through the valley of tears for years and years, would have been on the highway of prosperity.

What the productive energy of this country would have given to the world in this period from 1873 down to three years ago no man here can conceive. Such is the energy of this country, its industry, its resources, and the power of individual character, that there is no limit to its productiveness, and instead of seventy-five or eighty billions of dollars being the aggregate wealth of this country, there would have been a large excess beyond that point. During all that time the blood, the tears, the sweat, the agony of millions of human beings would have been prevented. But the party that teaches monometallism, that strives to strike down the money of the people and reduce the wage earnings of the poor, is without conscience, and refuses to debate the moral side of this question.

Mr. President, this prosperity is here for a while, but have we any guaranty of its permanence? What moment may not our mines be shut up by some cause as those of the Transvaal are to-day by the Boer and British war? What moment may the leads not peter out? What can we say about the capacity of the gold-producing countries of the world? At any rate, if we judge the future by the past, as far as history can give us a lesson it will show us that whenever the amount of money of redemption is decreased, there will be a proportionate shrinkage in the values of things and a proportionate diminution of the wage-earning power of the man who works and creates the wealth of the world.

There is another point—that we are enjoying a degree of prosperity to-day caused, as I said a while ago, in large part by the enormous balance of trade being in our favor. Yet we must understand this principle in finance, that it is impossible to maintain anywhere within the commercial world a higher level of trade prices than will obtain in the whole.

Prices go up here, as they did for wheat; they may go up for one thing or another, according to the local circumstances or to general conditions that may affect the whole world; but you may put it down as a proposition that amounts to an axiom that no country can long enjoy a price for its products superior to that enjoyed by the products of other countries, for the simple reason that so soon as money loses a part of its purchasing power, which it always does when prices go up, that very moment money takes its flight to the other places across the seas or the Continent, where money resumes the purchasing power that it lost in the place of its exit and becomes settled there until the level of prices is again maintained.

It is as the sea maintains its level. There are bays like the Bay of Fundy, like the waters on the coast of the Isthmus across which we propose to dig a canal, where local circumstances make the water higher than it is elsewhere—the trade winds, for instance, off the Isthmus of Panama—but, nevertheless, these great oceans and seas and bays maintain their general tide level all over the world. Just so it is with the great sea of money—I mean now the basic or redemption money all over the commercial world—which maintains its level; and if it becomes lower in one place for a while than it is at another, it will simply flow as the water does, for money is as mobile as water, to the place where the purchasing power is greater; and the result will be an equalization of prices.

I say that, in my opinion, if the nations of the world should concede to the United States alone the power to coin every atom of gold, silver, and copper that may be produced for twenty years, the United States would be no richer for that gift, because the very moment there was an increase of prices in the United States on account of this abundance of money, it would go to England, Germany, Belgium, or any other country that creates wealth, that very moment the metal would go back to that country and take its proper place in maintaining the level of prices everywhere.

There has been brought in here an amendment which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] has characterized as being rather late, being reported forty-six days after the bill was introduced, while the bill itself only received for consideration a few hours. I should be glad to know the beginning and origin of that amendment. That amendment holds out a shadow of hope of some kind to the American voter, for nobody else is expected to be influenced by it; certainly not an American thinker on this subject. The amendment substantially is that nothing contained in this bill shall be considered to exclude an effort toward international bimetallism.

If the Senator from Rhode Island were present I should like to ask him if he earnestly desires that silver shall be rehabilitated and be made with gold the standard measure of value, as he holds out the hope can be done by this amendment of his, or would he prefer the single gold standard with or without international concurrence and action? Mr. President, I do not believe in the sincerity of any man who votes for this bill or in his profession that he desires to have silver rehabilitated either by the independent or the concurrent action of this country with others.

We know the history of the last international commission on this subject. We sent a commission to England and France. We had a report by the very able chairman of that commission, the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]. We know that whilst he went there authorized by statute and appointed by the President to negotiate for international bimetallism, at the very moment when he and his colleagues were interviewing Lord Salisbury and other members of the British ministry, the Secretary of the Treasury, the fiscal agent of this Government and its highest authority upon the financial question, was making speeches before bankers' associations and declaring everywhere that the object and purpose of the Administration was to institute the single gold standard. The President had submitted to us that wonderful production of the Indianapolis convention—the only real gold monometallists in the country, if I may term them so—and advised us that he would like us to give it our careful consideration.

I am not going to twit gentlemen on the other side with traversing their records or with any inconsistency, for I believe, as Lord Palmerston said, that "the vanity of consistency is the vice of statesmen;" and I am sure that Republican statesmen are not guilty of the vice of consistency on this subject.

Mr. President, I can imagine the scene when this commission that we sent to England and France, consisting of a distinguished Senator, an ex-Vice-President of the United States, and a distinguished banker, interviewed the members of the British ministry and told them that the object and subject of their visit was to restore bimetallism by a concurrent agreement with Great Britain, and Lord Salisbury had just read in the morning paper the deliverance from the Secretary of the Treasury and the message of the President of the United States, declaring their wish and purpose to have the single gold standard. So the whole thing was discredited abroad and ignored or repudiated at home; and the commissioners, in my opinion, ought to have packed their baggage and sailed for the United States as soon as those utterances were brought to their attention.

Mr. President, I said a while ago that I did not know where this amendment came from or upon whose suggestion it was offered. Is it possible that something has been heard from the people of the country; that the chairman of the committee has had his ear to the ground and has heard something of the rumbling of the people in the West; or did he receive an intimation from the Executive that it would be agreeable to the President, in view of the campaign coming on, to have some little thing put in here that would delude—I am not using the language now of the President, for whom I have the greatest respect, but I am only drawing a logical inference—that there must be something put in here to make somebody believe, who would not believe it from the bill submitted, that there was still a hope for bimetallism if the Republican party could be trusted with renewal of power?

But I recollect, Mr. President, that last year Lord Aldenham, when giving his testimony on this subject before the British commission, declared that the United States alone could maintain the parity of the two metals, and that if India would join with this Government in opening her mints to silver there was not the slightest doubt of it; but the doubt was expressed whether the United States under this Administration, at least, was willing to take any action in favor of bimetallism. The distinguished gentleman, who had himself been governor of the Bank of England, and had sought to restore silver to its ancient and honorable place as one of the redemption moneys of the world, put on file, and it is published in his evidence, a letter from our Secretary of State, Mr. Hay, in which he declared that the President and a majority of his Cabinet still adhered to the idea of bimetallism.

We do not see anything in that direction in the utterances of the President; we do not see anything of that in anything done by his Cabinet; we do not see anything of that in anything that has been done here on this floor by the Republican party or in the House by them, except perhaps in this late amendment.

It has been stated that a member of the other House, in the last Congress, declared that to the fact that the last platform of the Republican party held out the hope of bimetallism through international negotiation over a hundred gentlemen owed their seats upon that floor. I do not know whether that is true or not, Mr. President, but I believe that a vast number of people in the Middle Western States and in the far West voted for the Republican party because they did not want to sever their lifelong association with the party with which they had been affiliated, and they voted for that party in the hope that this policy would be carried out and that the Republican party would make good the pledge contained in that platform.

But, Mr. President, the Republican party has been faithless in all the history of the money question. Time after time it has put into its platform a statement that it was the party of bimetallism; that it was for the use of both gold and silver without discrimination against either; that it wanted both to have the same power as legal tender, the same freedom of the mint; and so distinguished a gentleman as the President of the United States has declared in unequivocal terms that he favored that proposition. No longer than nine years ago he denounced the then President of the United States as being a man who labored to deprive silver of its proper function and to establish the single gold standard.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Who was that?

Mr. MONEY. Mr. McKinley.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I mean who was it he was denouncing?

Mr. MONEY. Mr. McKinley was denouncing Mr. Cleveland, designating him as "Grover Cleveland," for his attempt to institute the single gold standard.

Mr. BATE. He did that at Toledo.

Mr. MONEY. Yes; and at Cleveland also.

As I have stated, the Republican party has proved faithless to its pledges on this question, and to prove that assertion I appeal simply to its own history. I do not intend here to exculpate the Administration of Mr. Cleveland, who went the same way and maintained the same idea. To show that I am impartial in that matter, I will ask the Secretary to read for me a paper, which simply contains the planks of both parties on that question for the last four or five conventions, premising now that the Populist party has been always unequivocally for both metals in all its platforms.

The Secretary read as follows:

Beginning with 1880 the following declarations were made on the subject of finance by the Republican conventions:

1880.

"It has raised the value of our paper currency from 38 per cent to the par of gold; it has restored upon a solid basis payment in coin of all national obligations, and has given us a currency absolutely good and equal in every part of our extended country; it has lifted the credit of the nation from the point of where 6 per cent bonds sold at 86 to that where 4 per cent bonds are eagerly sought at a premium."

1884.

"We have always recommended the best money known to the civilized world; and we urge that efforts should be made to unite all commercial nations in the establishment of an international standard which shall fix for all the relative value of gold and silver coinage."

1888.

"The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver."

1892.

"The American people from tradition and interest favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal. The interests of the producers of the country, its farmers and its workingmen, demand that every dollar, paper or coin, issued by the Government shall be as good as any other. We commend the wise and patriotic steps already taken by our Government to secure an international conference to adopt such measures as will insure a parity of value between gold and silver for use as money throughout the world."

1896.

"The Republican party is unreservedly for sound money. It caused the enactment of the law providing for the resumption of specie payments in 1879; since then every dollar has been as good as gold. We are unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency or impair the credit of our country. We are therefore opposed to the free coinage of silver except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved. All our silver and paper currency must be maintained at parity with gold, and we favor all measures designed to maintain inviolably the obligations of the United States, and all our money, whether coin or paper, at the present standard, the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth."

Beginning with 1880 the following declarations were made on the subject of finance by the Democratic conventions:

1880.

"Home rule; honest money, consisting of gold and silver, and paper convertible into coin on demand; the strict maintenance of the public faith, State and national, and a tariff for revenue only."

1884.

"We believe in honest money, the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution, and a circulating medium convertible into such money without loss."

1888.

"The Democratic party of the United States, in national convention assembled, renews the pledge of its fidelity to Democratic faith and reaffirms the platform adopted by its representatives at the convention of 1884."

1892.

"We denounce the Republican legislation known as the Sherman Act of 1890 as a cowardly makeshift, fraught with possibilities of danger in the future which should make all of its supporters, as well as its author, anxious for its speedy repeal. We hold to the use of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage, but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, or be adjusted through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts, and we demand that all paper currency shall be kept at par with and redeemable in such coin. We insist upon this policy as especially necessary for the protection of the farmers and laboring classes, the first and most defenseless victims of unstable money and a fluctuating currency."

1896.

"Recognizing that the money question is paramount to all others at this time, we invite attention to the fact that the Constitution names silver and gold together as the money metals of the United States, and that the first coinage law passed by Congress under the Constitution made the silver dollar the money unit of value and admitted gold to free coinage at a ratio based upon the silver-dollar unit.

"We demand the free and unlimited coinage of both silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1 without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation. We demand that the standard silver dollar shall be a full legal tender equally with gold for all debts, public and private, and we favor such legislation as will prevent for the future the demonetization of any kind of legal tender-money by private contract."

Mr. MONEY. I ask the Secretary to now read a short excerpt from the able and instructive speech of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], giving the action of the different State Republican conventions on this subject.

The Secretary read as follows:

Michigan Republicans in 1890: We indorse the action of Congress upon the silver question and favor the unlimited use of gold and silver as the basis of legal-tender paper currency interchangeable with coin.

Nebraska, 1890 or 1891: The Republican party has given the people an elastic currency of gold, silver, and paper, and has raised the credit of the nation to one of the highest pitch of any country in the world, and its efforts to fully remonetize silver should be continued until it is on a perfect equality as a money metal with gold.

The New York Republican State convention in 1890-91 commended the Administration for "the prompt restoration of silver to its normal place in the commercial world."

Ohio, 1891: Approved of the action of Congress in fulfilling pledges of the party in legislation upon the coinage of silver, revision of the tariff, etc.

Oregon, April 16, 1891: We declare ourselves in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver and denounce any attempt to discriminate against silver as unwise and unjust.

Pennsylvania, June 25, 1891: Favored the use of both gold and silver.

Iowa Republicans in their platform of 1893: We are in favor of maintaining both gold and silver money as unlimited legal tender for the payment of debts; and in doing this Congress shall provide that every dollar, whether gold, silver, or paper, shall be kept of equal value.

Kansas, 1892: Favors such laws as will increase the coinage of silver. Approval of international bimetallism.

Missouri Republican convention, 1892: Favors international bimetallism.

Montana, 1892: Free and unlimited coinage of silver.

Nebraska, 1893: Adopts the national platform of 1892 as to the silver question.

Nevada: Free and unlimited coinage of silver.

Oregon: Indorses the Sherman bill.

Pennsylvania, 1893: Reaffirms the national platform on the money question and demands $40 per capita.

South Dakota, 1892: Reaffirms the national platform on silver.

Tennessee, 1892: Approves of the Sherman Act.

Wyoming, 1892: The money of the country should be founded on gold and silver, and this may be achieved by timely legislation—international conference.

California, 1892: We believe silver, equally with gold, to be the money of the people.

Colorado, 1892: Free and unlimited coinage of silver.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, that shows very fully the position of the Republican party as announced in their State and national platforms. That was the reflex, in my opinion, of the wishes of the voters of that party; but their leaders in Congress assembled, influenced, in my opinion, by the national banks, by the great corporate interests of this country, and by the bondholders, who were so vitally interested in maintaining the purchasing power of their interest, have uniformly falsified the pledges made in their conventions; and the steady tendency has been to this point, until almost the finishing stroke is to be given to silver, when silver is to be made no longer a money of redemption, when the greenbacks are to be impounded, when the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion has the unlimited power to sell bonds, when the intention is manifested of fixing a permanent debt upon the country, payable, interest and principal, in gold, with no option of redemption on the part of the Government, and to invest the national banks with additional power to control the business of this country and the value of property by contraction or expansion of the currency, by the permission to increase their notes to the face value of their bonds, and by the reduction by one-half of the tax on their circulation.

A gentleman very high in the councils of this country, a Republican, said to me the other day, "Our party progresses." So it does, Mr. President, from bad to worse in this financial question. In other words, there is no hope to the bimetallists who have steadily voted the Republican ticket, according to the testimony of its platforms and the concurrent record made here in Congress, that any of these promises, not even this shadowy one that is now offered by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, will ever be made good.

But, Mr. President, they have all along put in as a sort of a buffer the phrase that "it is the policy of the Government to maintain the parity of the two metals." That is not an excuse; it is hardly a decent pretense. Mr. Carlisle, the eminent Secretary of the Treasury in the late Administration of Mr. Cleveland, in a circular of information dated August, 1896, where the different kinds of money in the public Treasury were described, defined the different characters of paper money and in what they were redeemable, and then said as to the standard gold coin and the standard silver dollars of the United States, "they are not redeemable," being themselves money of redemption.

At the very next session of Congress that distinguished gentleman came before a committee of the other House and declared that he would redeem the silver dollars, if they were brought to the Treasury in order to maintain their parity. So with his predecessor and so with his successor; and that distinguished gentleman and also the present Secretary of the Treasury declared that they never consented to any measure that depreciated the purchasing power of the dollar.

Those gentlemen understood very well that there was no stability in the purchasing power of the dollar; that it all depended upon supply and demand; that money, like any other product of human industry, was dependent upon the demand for it and the supply of it, and that that alone could determine its value. One of the ways to reduce the supply was to demonetize a portion of it, or when monetized by law, to discredit it in the operations of the Treasury Department. In order to carry out this view, these gentlemen have always redeemed the bonds of this Government and the greenbacks when presented with one metal—gold—permitting the creditor in every case to say in which metal he would take his payment.

I want to say that such a disposition of a debt has never yet been adopted by any country on earth except this, and nowhere by any private debtor on this globe. How long would you maintain the parity of the two metals if every single private creditor in the United States had the liberty of going to his debtor and saying, "I do not care what the law says; I demand that you pay me in gold" or in silver, either one? Suppose they all had the power to do that, how long would the parity of the two metals be maintained?

Mr. President, if this Congress had solemnly passed a resolution declaring that the Secretary of the Treasury should establish and maintain the disparity of the two metals, the very course which has been pursued by these gentlemen would have been the one to effectuate the intent and will of this Congress. In other words, their constant treatment of this subject has been to depreciate the white metal and to effect a disparity instead of maintaining the parity. Why did they do it? Its logical tendency was that way. You can not reason it in any other way. It was not effected because the transactions of that Department in this regard are simply a bagatelle compared to the enormous business done by private parties in the United States.

What was the hundred or two hundred millions of redemption in gold of greenbacks presented to the Treasury by that endless chain, of which you have heard so much, compared with the seventy billions of private transactions and the twenty-six billions of debt in the United States, interest and principal of which were payable in silver or gold at the option of the debtor and not of the creditor? So that the people themselves, in their private transactions, by this choice of the debtor of the money payment, preserve the parity, despite the action of the Secretary. Did the Bank of France adopt this way to maintain the parity?

Yet, France with only 30,000,000 people, with an area of only 200,000 square miles, for seventy-five years maintained against all the world the parity of gold and silver at 15½ to 1, by simply making both free to the mints, both a full legal tender for any amount, and by paying to the owner of her debentures or certificates of indebtedness when presented to her either metal that she chose. No man can go to France and say, "I want this debt paid in gold," or "in silver," or anything else. They paid them just what they pleased and what the condition of the treasury permitted them to pay, whatever would maintain the parity of the two metals. Yet we have been pursuing the other course, the obviously proper course to establish and maintain a disparity of the two metals.

So there has never yet been an honest effort made by any Administration to maintain the parity of these two metals, although the phraseology is repeated with damnable iteration in every platform and in every law. There is nothing in it but delusion. There never was intended that anything should be in it, in my opinion. In other words, a game of confidence has been played upon the people of the United States, who have been robbed of their rights, whose labor has been depreciated in its price, whose products have been depreciated in their price, whose money has been cornered, and who have endured suffering and distress and the direst poverty for the last two or three decades because of this action on the part of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious that had there been an honest design on the part of any party in power to maintain the parity of the two metals, then the great fiscal officer of the United States would not have disparaged one of them by permitting the creditor to say which one of the metals he would take. It is plain to any man who can think. That act of itself has had the tendency, if it did not the effect, for the reason I have stated here, of widening the difference between the two metals. All along the people have not been honestly dealt with, in my opinion.

Wherever this amendment came from, it is a delusion intended to catch votes, and that is all. It was never intended that anything actually shall be done in the way of an international agreement. What is the use of commissioning distinguished gentlemen and taking them from their seats in the Senate and sending them abroad, and at the same time the Administration, through its head and great Secretary of the Treasury discrediting that commission by declaring to the Congress and the country that the single gold standard must be maintained, and by a recommendation here of a platform made by the bankers and brokers at Indianapolis for the single gold standard?

Mr. President, I want to say, with all respect to bankers, that if there is one single class of men in the United States who are absolutely disqualified to deal with this subject it is the bankers. In the first place, their interest is against the interest of the people at large. In the next place, their training is against their full understanding of the subject. They look at it from one point of view, and that is their own selfish interest. How can they make a good per cent for the money deposited in their banks and paid in there by the shareholders? And that is all the banker thinks about.

It is not his business to take care of the country; it is not his business to look after the poor; it is not his business to see that the producing energies of this country shall be always constantly and fully employed. His business is to enrich the banks, to pay a good interest to the depositor and induce more deposits, to build up the price of the shares in his particular bank, and he does not care for anything else, in my opinion. I have never yet seen one advance, in any argument, a single moral suggestion. I have never yet seen one evince a single gleam of sympathy for the people of the country who are laboring under the restrictions placed upon business by this attempt, and its partial success up to date, to fix upon them the single gold standard.

It is very obvious to me that there can be nothing in a republic that is worse than two things: one is offices without salaries and the other is a permanent public debt. A permanent public debt means that the country is to be controlled by the men who own that debt. There was some excuse for Mr. Gladstone, as a British statesman, when he declared that he would not enter into any scheme for the restoration of bimetallism because, he said, "We are a creditor country; we own ten billions of debts against other countries, and London is the countinghouse of the world, and upon our counter you must pay the gold coin which we recognize as the standard and measure of value. We will not throw away the increased value of money paid to us for the benefit of those who produce the things that we must buy, and enhance prices by accepting bimetallism." Therefore he declined the proposition to send delegates to a conference.

There was excuse for him, as a British statesman, taking care of a great creditor nation; but there is no excuse for the statesmen of America, a great producing nation, a nation with more possibilities in production, not only its output, but in possibilities, than any other nation on earth, to say that we should accept the position of a creditor nation when we owe the world and have the means of producing the articles to pay. In other words, that we shall enhance the price of that with which we pay our interest and reduce the price of the things we make and which we must sell in order to secure the money to pay that interest.

It is an anomaly in politics that a man can live and successfully hold office by the votes of the people who constantly legislates against their interest in this way. Mr. President, I do not mean to say all monometallists are dishonest. I do not think that one-tenth understand anything about the question—not a single thing. I mean those who simply vote; and I will go further and say that I do not believe that one-tenth of those who discuss the question know anything about it. Their debates show they do not understand it. But when an honest monometallist comes down, as Chevalier and De Quincy and Rogers and others, and says we want a single metal because it enhances the price of it, it gives us greater control over the labor of men, it gives us their products, whatever they may be, at a reduced price; in other words, our incomes have made us so powerful that we can disregard all the laws of ethics and morals and the rights of humanity, that man understands his business.

He is a monometallist. That is what he wants. But the men who sit in this Chamber and the other are not to protect a class of people already too powerful. They are not to protect the interest of those who least of all the people in the world need the protection of legislation. They are to protect the weak and helpless and to see that all men have an equal chance before the law, and, among other things, that the vital question of money is settled in their interest and not in the interest of the corporations and the bondholders of the world.

Mr. President, it is not alone the bondholders of the United States who are behind all these things—this movement to dishonor silver, this movement to curtail the volume of the money of the world in order to enhance its purchasing power and depreciate the labor and the products of the world. It is not simply the bondholder of America: it is the bondholder of the world; it is the brotherhood of wealth, the aristocracy of wealth; it is the money power, if I may use that single term to express my meaning. Those people do not operate from New York, but from London. From Berlin, from Paris, from Brussels, from every money center in Europe judgment is held upon the measures pending in both of these Houses, and their verdict decides it, and not your party platforms or speeches made here or anywhere.

No country has ever yet demonetized any metal until the bondholder got powerful enough and the debts got big enough to enable him to control legislation, and he has never yet failed to control it. This affects the people of the world, not only of America. If money goes up here, it will go up everywhere.

In my opinion this nation with its three and a half million square miles, with its 80,000,000 people, has the power to open its mints and produce at the very moment that the door is swung wide to the producer of silver bullion a parity not only of the coins—they are a parity all over the world—but the two metals in bullion all over the world. There is not a man in South Africa, there is not a man in Asia, there is not a man in Europe or America who would sell a solitary ounce of his silver to any broker for less than it would bring him at the mint of the United States, less the cost of transportation and insurance, perhaps. He would be an idiot if he did, and the people who hold bullion are not idiots. They are men of business or they would not have it.

Mr. President, I am against this bill because it is one of a series of measures which have constantly inflicted upon this people such suffering and want as was not equaled by the four years of bloody fraternal strife and the six dismal years of reconstruction that followed it. There has been more hardship, there has been more suffering, there has been more distress, caused by the demonetization of silver in this country and abroad than by all the wars that ever were waged in any one decade in human history.

Mr. President, it is no pleasure, of course, to say that any party is responsible for this. I do not accuse Republicans alone of this. There are Democrats who are deeply implicated, too, and I do not say that anybody who has had a part in these laws intended to bring the distress upon the people which I believe they have brought. I do not attack any person or his motives, but I speak now of that movement which has for its foundation the interest of the owners of Government certificates of indebtedness as well as private mortgages, the people of money who have controlled the finances as well as the legislation of the world. They together have wrought this mischief that we are now about to consummate.

I do not expect that anything said in this debate will have any effect upon the passage of this bill. All we can do is to stand here and protest. It is the right of the minority, and it is the only right the minority now have in this Chamber. We can talk and protest: that is all. But I do wish the Republicans would deal honestly and every one of them vote against the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], which pretends to hold out the hope of bimetallism, when every one of you know, in my opinion, that you do not intend to have any international bimetallism; that you believe honestly that the single gold standard is the best.

If the nations of Europe were to-morrow to combine and tender you free mints and unlimited legal tender to both metals alike, without discrimination in favor of or against either, you would not accept it. The Republican party can not pose as the poor man's friend in this business. You impound the greenbacks. You set on foot a permanent national debt, with principal and interest payable in gold. You allow this to be enlarged at the discretion of the Secretary. You impound the greenbacks, as I said; you retire other certificates, and you leave no option whatever with the debt-paying people, for they have demonstrated in the last thirty years that no country ever had such resources and such willingness to discharge their obligations as the people of the United States.

When this prosperity of to-day, this wave—you have named it well; it is a wave; it is not a tide; a wave that is evanescent—when this prosperity is over and this trouble comes back to the people of the United States, and prices fall—a certain distinguished Senator told me that wheat on his farm is worth 27 cents—you will hear from the people whose wages have been reduced.

I heard the late Secretary of the Treasury declare, and I have heard that the present Secretary had declared, that they never would favor a dollar that could lose any of its purchasing power. Then, whenever a dollar ceases to buy as many pounds of cotton as it does to-day, whenever it ceases to buy as many bushels of wheat; for instance, when wheat goes up from 27 to 54 cents, then the dollar has lost one-half of its purchasing power. When it buys anything, when it hires a day's labor for 50 cents and it requires afterwards a dollar, it has lost its purchasing power by one-half.

These distinguished gentlemen, the Secretaries of the Treasury, have put themselves upon record, and the Republican party is putting itself upon that record, that they do not want a dollar that will lose its purchasing power, and obviously and irresistibly that they do not want a dollar that will increase the price of wheat or cotton or the wages of labor or anything else that is produced by the masses of the country. You can not escape that conclusion. If a dollar is not to lose its value, then how is the value of the article it buys to be increased? I should like some gentleman in his time to explain that.

No; the prosperity of this country depends upon the industries of its citizens. The industries of its citizens depend upon the employment of its citizens. When hundreds and thousands and millions of people in these United States are out of employment and can not get it, then there is something wrong, and every one of you knows it and recognizes it. When there is plenty of money—an abundance to meet the business of the country—then every field of industry is exploited that can be opened, new fields are added to agriculture, new mines are dug, new canals are excavated, new railroads are built, new factories go up, and life and prosperity and contentment exist everywhere.

Mr. President, we have been rescued, in my opinion, by this temporary advance in prices, caused by things not affected by the election of anybody on earth or any party platform, but simply by the extraordinary production in the last five years of the precious metals, twice the amount the previous five years produced, and by the accidental fact of the failure of the wheat crop all over Europe, Africa, Asia, and Australia and its abundance in this country, and the immense balance of trade in our favor, amounting to $626,000,000.

To that is due not only the present content of the country, but to it we are indebted for the escape from greater evils than mere hard times and the deprivation of the people. We were standing on a slumbering volcano, and we did not seem to recognize the fact. We could not hear the mutterings and growlings of the great giant beneath us, ready to burst and engulf us in a moment. We did not recognize the people in distress, the cry of the unemployed everywhere, those living on insufficient wages, breeding socialism and anarchistic teachings—those pestilential concerns that are the product of another country, the effete monarchies of Europe, which should never find a foothold, much less flourish, in this country, where all avenues are open to wealth and fame.

Here they grew rank and noisome, and they threatened the very existence of this country. That terror, that incalculable horror that might have overtaken us has been checked by the recent rise in prices, caused by the action of no political party, not creditable to anybody's prevision, to anybody's sagacity, but to an act of Providence itself, that struck down nine-tenths of the world with bad crops, and by the balance of trade in our favor caused by the most extraordinary energy of the people.

We are the greatest producing country and the great owing country—the great debtor country of the world—and we are to limit ourselves in the capacity of production by circumscribing the field of industrial operations and depriving ourselves of the implement of commerce—the money that brings up the price of the products and stimulates industry. We can feed the world; we can clothe the world; we can equip the world. We are equal to all the world. The trade of the whole of Continental Europe combined is not equivalent to the interstate trade of this country, and yet we consent to tie one of our hands in this industrial contest with the balance of mankind.

In spite of it all, in spite of this deprivation, in spite of this lack of anything like political economy in our rulers and legislators, in spite of all, we have brought the balance of trade in our favor; and I will say to the gentlemen on the other side that we did it without owning a colony in the world, while our great competitor that owns colonies all over the world, in every sea and strait and gulf, continents and islands, has fallen behind us in the race for trade. She sees no way of regaining her ascendency, and the United States of America, whether wise or unwise, is destined to take the hegemony of the nations of the world.

Mr. President, how immeasurably greater would be our predominance, our capacity increased, if we were to give to our people the commonest implement of commerce—the money they need; and of course that is a contribution to the money of the world. It all goes in at last to settle the level of prices; and as all the things that are for sale are measured by all the money there is to buy them, the scarcity of money must cause a depreciation of every product of industry, and that means a depression of every man who labors. So labor lifts up its hardened hand and begs you not any further to restrict its capacity to perform.

Mr. President, we can work out our destiny, because there is inherent capacity. There is a capacity in the American people, derived from Anglo-Saxon blood and from that cosmopolitan character which we have admitted into it by welcoming the refugees from all the nations of Europe, which has given us a particular strain of blood that is capable of almost anything it undertakes, except one thing in which I fear failure—the capacity to govern itself. But that belongs to the future.

Mr. President, while these people are here—restless when unemployed; anarchistic, many of them, from their earliest teaching; communistic, many of them, from philosophy and teaching—we ought to preserve the country as it is to-day, to develop the individuality of the American citizen; and God forbid that the time shall ever come when type and not individuality shall prevail in the United States of America. When that day comes the capacity for self-government will have perished from the earth, so far as we are concerned, and "the flag of the Republic will come down on the Capitol when the flag of empire goes up at Manila."

Mr. President, I have no desire to extend these remarks. I have spoken now because I found a vacant time in the proceedings of the Senate; but I want to say in conclusion that I never had a more earnest conviction in my life upon any subject, and I have dealt honestly with myself in this matter. No greater calamity can come upon the people of this country than the failure on the part of their rulers to provide in some safe way for a return to the money of the Constitution.

There is no preference as mere metal of one over the other. Money is the creature of law. Aristotle said that twenty-three hundred years ago. Since his time it has been repeated over and over again. It is not a thing of intrinsic value. That contradictory term has deluded many voters. There is no such thing as intrinsic value, and there can not be, because "intrinsic" means something within itself, with no relation to anything else; "value" is a relation of two things, and is therefore not intrinsic. So there is no truth in the phrase, although it is embedded in the statutes and in platforms. It simply misguides and deludes the masses of the people.

We have had two metals, and they served our purpose well. I want to call attention to this fact when you are about to put on your statute books a further measure to discredit silver: At the time when silver was demonetized it was not a base metal. When we demonetized silver it was worth 3 cents more than the gold dollar. We could not keep it here because it was a better dollar than the gold dollar, and Mr. Sherman, the most distinguished member of the Senate since my knowledge of it, stood in his place and answered the inquiry of Mr. Roscoe Conkling and Mr. Morrill and declared that the reason why he dropped the silver dollar from the American coins was because it was of such a value that it immediately went into the melting pot, and the man who got it found it worth more as bullion than as coin. That was true all over the world. It was not a 50-cent dollar, but a dollar-and-3-cents dollar that was demonetized, judged by the value of the gold dollar.

It is abundant money that the people want. The two are arrayed against one another, and there is no peace between them. The question is who is to be served, whether the money power of the world, the people who hold the thirty-two billions of public debt, the people who own the billions of private mortgages, shall succeed in controlling the destiny of the world and in putting down the price of everything created by human industry, or whether the great toiling masses are to receive a fair remuneration for their labor; and God help the right in this struggle.

Mr. ALLISON. Unless some other Senator desires to speak upon this question, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HALE. There is a little matter which I wish to have taken up.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

PAY OF RETIRED MARINE CORPS OFFICERS.

Mr. HALE. There is on the Calendar a joint resolution (S. R. 39) to provide for the payment of salary to certain retired officers of the Marine Corps. I ask that it may be taken up. Then I shall ask that a House joint resolution of exactly the same purport may be acted upon, and the Senate joint resolution indefinitely postponed.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is the Calendar number?

Mr. HALE. No. 161. It simply provides for the pay of certain retired officers of the Marine Corps. I have the House joint resolution, which I will send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RAWLINS in the chair). The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which will be read.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 77) to provide for pay to certain retired officers of the Marine Corps was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the aggregate of all sums appropriated in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899, under the head "Pay, Marine Corps," shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law as pay of the Marine Corps, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund; the provisions of this act to take effect from June 30, 1899.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the joint resolution come from the House in a formal way?

Mr. HALE. Yes, Mr. President; the Senate has on its Calendar a similar measure——

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand; I have the Calendar before me. But how can the House joint resolution get in to be considered now? Was it referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and reported back?

Mr. HALE. The House joint resolution, which is precisely the same as the Senate one on the Calendar, was passed by the other House and came here.

Mr. ALLISON. It has not been referred?

Mr. HALE. It has not been referred, I understand.

Mr. COCKRELL. You propose to take the original House joint resolution from the table?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; from the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is all right.

Mr. HALE. And ask that it may be passed. Then I shall ask that the other joint resolution may be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was it the House joint resolution that was read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerks inform the Chair that the original House joint resolution is now before the Committee on Naval Affairs and is not before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL (to Mr. HALE). You will have to report it back.

Mr. HALE. I will move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution. I have been absent, and did not know it had been referred. I move that the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of House joint resolution 77.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now I ask that the joint resolution be put upon its passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. All I wanted was to get the proper measure before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. That is all right. I am very glad the Senator called attention to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine for the present consideration of House joint resolution No. 77?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. Now I move that the joint resolution (S. R. 39) to provide for the payment of salary to certain retired officers of the Marine Corps be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the following notice.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. BUTLER gives notice that on Monday, February 12, following the remarks of Mr. WOLCOTT, he will address the Senate upon the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 12, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 12, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on motion of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal, without objection, will stand approved.

THE FRIGATE CONSTITUTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill on the table from the House of Representatives, which has been read twice by its title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 3718) for the preservation of the frigate Constitution.

Mr. LODGE. If there is no objection, I should be very glad if that bill could be disposed of. One similar to it has been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it on the Calendar?

Mr. LODGE. It is on the Calendar.

Mr. TILLMAN. As the other bill was in my charge, I ask the Chair to wait just a few minutes that I may examine the House bill and compare it with the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well. The Chair will withdraw it for the moment.

Mr. TILLMAN subsequently said: I should like to have the bill (H. R. 3718) for the preservation of the frigate Constitution taken up and put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks for the present consideration of the bill. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to place the frigate Constitution, now lying at the Boston Navy-Yard, as near as may be consistent with her preservation, in the same condition as regards her hull and rigging as she was when in active service: Provided, That before beginning on such work a sufficient sum of money to complete such work shall be raised through the agency of the Massachusetts State Society United States Daughters of 1812 and placed at his disposal for the purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the bill (S. 2034) providing for the repairing of and again placing in commission the U. S. frigate Constitution, which is now on the Calendar, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF HISTORY AND ART.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of Franklin W. Smith, of Boston, Mass., praying for an appropriation of land for a site for a national gallery of history and art and for aid in the establishment thereof.

I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in regard to this petition. The petitioner is a business man of great distinction and success, who for many years has devoted his life to the promotion of a national gallery of art which shall represent and reproduce the architecture, both public or ornamental and domestic, of the ancient nations, especially Greece and Rome, but also the oriental cities. He has devoted his whole time to a study of that subject and has become an eminent authority. He has made a large collection of books and prints, and has on New York avenue in this city built and adorned and embellished some halls showing great beauty and in full size Roman and Grecian architecture.

What the petitioner desires is to have the site of the old Observatory appropriated by the United States, and some land in the neighborhood, where he will place his own collection and devote himself entirely, if he may be permitted, to advancing that work. It will become, at a very moderate cost, a great ornament to the capital of the nation, and it will have an educational power, he thinks, more potent than many lectureships or professorships. He hopes very much that the members of the two Houses will, before acting upon his petition, visit, as some gentlemen I am told have already visited, his beautiful collection and buildings here.

I ask unanimous consent that this petition, which is very brief, comprising a page or two, and the design and prospectus which accompanies it, may be printed as a document, for the use of the Senate. I understand that there are some plates, but he has all the plates prepared, so that that will be no cost to the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. HOAR. I rather think it would be better on the whole that the petition should go to the Committee on the District of Columbia, as it asks for the occupation of certain lands within the District.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the paper which he presents may be printed as a document.

Mr. HOAR. The petition and papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

I present a brief statement submitted on behalf of certain American cable manufacturers, urging the retention of the American manufacture clause in any bill to be passed by Congress authorizing the construction of a trans-Atlantic cable. COURT OF PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2356) extending the powers and functions of the Court of Private Land Claims to June 30, 1902, to report it without amendment. This is a bill simply to extend the life of the Private Land Claims Commission until next June a year. If I may be pardoned to make a statement before the bill is read, there are a good many cases pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, and if a new trial should be ordered in any of them, it would, of course, be necessary that the tribunal should be continued. The bill comes from the Attorney-General's Office. It has the unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee, and I ask that it now be put on its passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the powers and functions of the Court of Private Land Claims, created by act of March 3, 1891, shall cease and determine on June 30, 1902, instead of June 30, 1900.

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed; but the appropriation of $12,000 by act of February 24, 1899, to pay assistants to the attorney for the court, shall continue available before and after June 30, 1900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOREIGN WEIGHTS, MEASURES, ETC.

Mr. MONEY. I introduce a joint resolution which I ask may be read. It is very short.

The joint resolution (S. R. 86) for the printing of English interpretation of foreign terms as to weights, measures, and so forth, occurring in Government publications; which was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That whenever any book, document, or paper published at the public expense by any branch of the Government any term is used in a foreign language to express weight, measure, dimension, or value, that there shall be inserted at the same place the equivalent term in the English language as spoken in America.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, will it be in order to ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator might ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read once more.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is a printing resolution and must be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a question which goes to the Committee on Printing, I suggest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing in the absence of objection.

Mr. MONEY. One moment, Mr. President. That is not a proper reference. The Senator will excuse me. It is not a question about whether anything will be printed or not, but it is a question, I think, that ought to be determined by the Senate without a reference. However, if it goes to any committee it should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is a question relating to printing, I suggest.

Mr. MONEY. No; it does not relate to any order for printing at all. It is phraseology to be used by the several departments in printing. It does not relate to an order to print anything, and therefore it should not be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know that I care to what committee it shall be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not, the Chair lays before the Senate House bill No. 1.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Some time ago I had the honor to introduce a resolution for the investigation of the relations existing between the National City Bank of New York and the Hanover National Bank of that city and the United States Treasury Department. That resolution was passed over by unanimous consent from day to day without losing its place, and it has never been acted upon. I should like to know what its parliamentary status now is and when it is to be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There were two or three of those resolutions, and by unanimous consent they were allowed to retain their place without prejudice. Therefore, after the unanimous consent agreement touching the financial bill is exhausted, they will come up in the regular order immediately after the morning business. The resolution presented by the Senator on Saturday is not in that category.

Mr. ALLEN. That resolution I should like to have laid before the Senate, unless some Senator is ready to proceed with the discussion of the financial bill. In that event I will be very willing to have it passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would have to be laid before the Senate by unanimous consent, because there is another unanimous-consent agreement prevailing, which calls for the consideration of the financial bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] is ready to go on.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well. Then I ask unanimous consent that both these resolutions be passed over without losing their right of way, to be considered at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the resolution offered by him may retain its place without prejudice.

Mr. LODGE. What resolution is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Boer resolution, which passed the Senate last Saturday and was reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 10th instant approved and signed the act (S. 734) relating to Cuban vessels.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I listened with interest to the able speech of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], delivered on Saturday in this Chamber from the standpoint of the free coinage of silver, and I noticed the emphasis he put upon his objection to the first eight lines of the Senate committee's substitute. I wish to say that those are lines of the bill that I particularly approve of, and that my objections will be confined to the funding scheme as set forth in the bill. The speech made by the Senator from New Hampshire will be circulated, I take it, in the approaching campaign by the hundreds of thousands, but not by his old associates in the Republican party and not by the Republican national committee.

Mr. President, the bill reported by the Finance Committee as a substitute for the House bill is the most important financial measure that has been presented to Congress since the civil war. The chief feature and strength of the bill is its emphatic and unequivocal declaration in favor of the gold standard and the committal of the United States to the payment of its indebtedness of all kinds, interest bearing and noninterest bearing, in gold, thereby rendering it impossible that there should be any doubt in the future on the subject, or that there should be any hope of paying the same in a depreciated currency. If the bill becomes a law, it will strengthen the public credit at home and abroad, making it the highest and safest in the world.

The increase in the gold reserve provided for in the bill will help materially to carry out its general provisions and to keep our finances on a firm basis.

The bill is the outcome of constant discussion and education of the people, through the press, in Congress, and on the platform, for the last thirty years. It is only through the education of the people on the important and difficult subject of finance that such a satisfactory and correct result could have been reached. This is the only time during the last quarter of a century that the question of the standard of value could be placed beyond the possibility of doubt and discussion, as so wisely done in the Senate bill.

The bill will not operate to delay or impair the cause of international bimetallism. It leaves that question open, and bimetallists can consistently support the bill, especially if the amendment offered by the Finance Committee should be adopted. The amendment is as follows:

SEC. —. That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism, provided the same be secured by concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver.

I am not without hope that there will yet be an international arrangement by which silver can be more largely used with gold than now as money of the world. We are using more silver than gold as money. There are now in the Treasury 406,612,406 standard silver dollars, besides silver bullion of 1890 to the amount of $80,440,918. Against this silver there are outstanding $105,363,504 of silver certificates, which is the best form in which to use silver money. The United States is using to-day nearly $500,000,000 of silver, and will increase the amount when it can be done with safety.

The general provisions of the bill have my approval, and it is my purpose to vote for it, but I venture with some hesitation to express in opposition to the mature judgment of the members of the Finance Committee, and more particularly the judgment of its able chairman, who is an acknowledged authority on the subject of finance and political economy not only in this country, but abroad, some doubts and some apprehensions that have come into my mind, as to the wisdom of attempting in this bill to provide for the refunding of the larger part of the public debt on a basis of 2 per cent interest. My criticism of the bill will be confined to the sixth section, or the scheme of funding the public debt as set forth in said section.

The refunding of the public debt is not necessarily a part of the bill. The bill is for another and different purpose. Why mix the object of establishing and defining the monetary standard and strengthening the public credit with what must, at best, under the provisions of the bill, be an experiment, and which, if it should fail, prove hurtful to the general purposes and policy of the measure and the public interest? The refunding of the public debt is purely a practical or administrative question. It should have no place in our politics, nor be connected in any wise with political questions. It should not be a part of this bill, because the question of a monetary standard, or standard of value, has been for years largely political, dividing the great parties more sharply than almost any other public question. The refunding of the public debt should be made the subject of a separate bill, to be considered and passed when our bonds mature and monetary conditions may be entirely different.

The bill undertakes too much; it not only defines and establishes the monetary standard, but sets out a scheme to fund the public debt four years before any of our bonds mature; and in order to make this scheme a success, it provides that the national banks shall be the most important factors in its execution.

In my judgment, the public debt should be funded without any reference whatever to the national banks. Let the scheme of funding stand on its own merits and by itself. Let the Government go forward when the time comes and borrow money for funding purposes at as low rate of interest as it can, making such a rate as will insure the bonds being maintained at par, without depending on national banks or any outside agency and without giving grounds for the impression that a public debt is to be encouraged and fostered in order to provide a safe currency. Only about one-ninth of the money in circulation on January 1 was national-bank note circulation. It is possible to have a sound currency without a public debt. Our constant aim should be to extinguish the public debt.

But there are other reasons why it appears to me unwise at this time to legislate definitely on the subject of refunding the public debt. There is no pressing need for doing so, and it seems to me we should not reach conclusions and legislate from the standpoint of vision or of the highest wave of prosperity the country has ever had. The conditions which surround us in the financial and commercial world are extraordinary, and are calculated to make us optimistic. It is this most favorable condition of affairs, I think, which has induced the committee and its distinguished chairman—usually so conservative and whose judgment is so clear on questions of finance—to take the hopeful views expressed in his speech on the bill. Present favorable conditions will not always exist; they will be followed naturally by a reaction that will bring new experiences which will enable us, with our present experience, to judge better than now what may be done in the matter of funding the public debt when our bonds mature. By the time our first bonds mature monetary conditions may be entirely different. The question of refunding can be delayed without hurt and possibly with benefit to the public interest.

Mr. President, I admit that it may be possible under present conditions, with the inducements offered in the bill, to fund perhaps the larger portion of the $849,000,000 of our 3 per cent, 4 per cent, and 5 per cent bonds maturing in 1904, 1907, and 1908. But it is not the question of the ability of the Government, now or hereafter, to fund all or a larger part of these bonds on a 2 per cent basis. The underlying question and the important one that must be carefully considered is, Can the United States maintain the 2 per cent bonds at par during the life of the bonds? Of course, when money is needed, as now, for active business, a great many national banks will buy these 2 per cent bonds and increase their note circulation. But when times become hard, business stagnant, and there is no demand for money, to my mind it seems the banks would largely surrender their bond holdings by selling them on the market. This would not only cause them to fall below par, but would bring about a contraction of the currency which should at all times be avoided if possible.

The chairman of the committee, by way of argument in favor of funding on a 2 per cent basis, shows that on $849,332,520 of bonds that will mature in 1904, 1907, and 1908 there would be an annual saving of $15,973,882.60; in other words, that interest would be reduced from $33,000,000 (in round numbers) to about $16,000,000. Of course any scheme or plan which saves interest on the public debt is both attractive and desirable; but the fact that we may now fund a large portion or all of our bonds at par is not conclusive that we can maintain them at par. The question is, Can the United States not only fund its debt at 2 per cent, but can it maintain its 2 per cent bonds at par during their existence?

But apart from this feature of the case the chairman of the committee argues that the funding scheme must be a success, because the inducements offered national banks in the bill are so great that it will be to their interest to take the 2 per cent bonds at par and take out circulation on the same. Would it not be better and in the public interest to make the rate of interest higher and offer no premiums to exchange bonds and no inducements to the national banks? It may turn out that the advantages offered the banks may cost the Government more than the saving in interest that will result from funding the debt at 2 per cent.

A good showing in the saving of the annual interest could be made by funding the public debt on a basis of even 2½ or 3 per cent interest. If there is a well-founded opinion that the debt can be funded at 2 per cent and maintained at par, it would be reasonable to suppose that placing the rate at 2½ per cent would make the funding and keeping the bonds at par certain. On the basis of 2½ per cent, the annual saving in interest would be $11,635,009, the difference between funding on a basis of 2 per cent and 2½ per cent being about $4,000,000 per annum.

It seems to me a safer course would be to allow a margin of discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury in the matter of refunding the public debt when the time comes; for instance, give him authority to refund at a rate not exceeding, say, 3 per cent per annum. Why should a lower rate of interest than was ever attempted by any government be definitely written down in our law? Would it not be safer to name a higher rate of interest with a margin of discretion when there is a well-grounded apprehension that 2 per cent is too low? Two per cent is a lower rate of interest than is paid to-day, or ever was paid, by any of the great nations. Take the figures cited in the very able speech of the chairman of the Finance Committee.

He says that only four times in the century from 1789 to 1889 did British 3 per cent consols reach par, and even now her securities yield only 2½ per cent interest; while the 4 per cent gold bonds of Austria are selling 3 per cent below par; the Netherlands', bearing 2½ per cent, are selling between 18 and 20 per cent below par; the debt of France, bearing 3 per cent, is oftener 2 per cent below par than at par; the German imperial loan is selling from 10 to 12 per cent below par.

Having in mind the failure of all these Governments to maintain at par for a long time even a 3 per cent bond, how was it possible for the committee to reach the conclusion that the United States could at one bound go forward and accomplish more than any other Government has ever been able to do? In my judgment, the refunding scheme as presented in the sixth section is too optimistic. To adopt this section would be running a great risk. We can not hope to do in the matter of our finances what all other nations, especially Great Britain, the richest in the world, have failed to do. She has never reached a standard as low as 2 per cent for her national borrowings. It seems to me that we should be sure of the rate of interest on which the public debt can be funded and maintained at par, and make no mistake in this regard; the consequences of failure would be disastrous. It would be almost a calamity for this Government to refund its bonds at 2 per cent, and later on, finding it impracticable, be forced to refund at a higher rate of interest. Such a failure would be not only humiliating, but almost a national disgrace. It would destroy confidence and impair the national credit at home and abroad. It would hurt the bill, should it become a law, in its other provisions, and give to the opponents of sound finance and stable currency an argument against the gold standard.

The chief argument of the distinguished chairman in support of the refunding feature of the bill is based largely upon the supposition that national banks will aid materially in the funding of the public debt at 2 per cent; because the provisions of the bill allowing national banks to issue circulation up to the face value of bonds and the reduction of the tax on circulation will be of such advantage to the banks that they will at once buy the 2 per cent bonds and take out circulation on them.

The circulation of national banks is not so profitable nor the source of untold wealth some suppose. The capitalization of national banks on the 1st of December last was about $620,516,245, to which may be added $341,099,383 surplus and undivided profits which could be converted into capital if it would pay to do so, making an aggregate of $961,615,628, while the amount of national-bank notes in circulation secured by bonds was only $207,000,000. It is evident if circulation was as profitable as claimed and believed by many, the banks would take out an amount equal to the full amount of their surplus and capital instead of less than one-fourth of the same. Speaking from some experience gained by being interested in a small way in national banks, I do not think national banks find note circulation on the whole so profitable that they would make any great effort to prevent its being taken from them. I surely would make no opposition to surrendering, especially if the banks could be assured that as sound and safe a currency could be provided to take the place of note circulation.

The great advantage national banks enjoy over private or State banks is not the profit realized from circulation, but the safety that comes from Government scrutiny through periodical examinations. The fact that the Government at all times, through its agents and officers, has authority to examine the books, accounts, securities, and cash of national banks, and decide whether or not they are in a sound condition, induces confidence in them and is worth more than the profits from note circulation.

Reducing the tax on circulation one-half per cent and permitting the issue of bank notes up to the face value of 2 per cent bonds may not be a sufficient inducement to national banks to largely increase circulation, even if all the circulation could be kept outstanding. A bank with $100,000 circulation would get $2,000 income from its bonds; from this amount would be deducted tax, $500, and expense of redemption, $125; total, $625; leaving an annual profit of $1,375. Two conditions are necessary to this result; one is that the circulation must be all outstanding, and the other is that under no circumstances shall the bonds fall below par. We can not guarantee these conditions by legislation. We can not insure by legislation that bonds taken by national banks as a basis of circulation will not fall below par, and in the event of the bonds going below par confusion and disaster would follow.

In case the bonds should decline 2 per cent, what would be the result? Under the law the Secretary of the Treasury would have to call for additional bonds to secure circulation. This might happen at a time when the banks could not raise money. But, suppose after the Secretary of the Treasury had called for additional bonds to secure circulation, and they were furnished, the bonds should suffer another decline of 2 per cent. He would have to make still another call. In case of a protracted war our bonds might fall even 20 or 30 per cent, and this might happen at a time when national banks could not deposit more bonds to secure note circulation. The bill makes no provision, and I do not know that any could be made, to meet such emergencies.

Then, again, securing by legislation a low rate of interest through profitable inducements to national banks may not in the end be the best thing for the country. A low rate of interest will, in the long run, tend to make low prices for commodities. If the use of money can be bought cheaply it may have the effect to make everything else cheap. I am afraid a very low rate of interest might tend to reduce wages. I do not say that it will have this effect. I only have a fear. One of the glories of the Republic is that American labor is the best paid in the world, and this should be maintained if possible. The Government, at least, should not do anything that would have a tendency to reduce wages. We should continue, so far as we consistently can, to do everything to keep up the price of labor and resist everything that even looks toward a reduction in wages. Good wages make good, happy, and contented citizens. Wages, and high wages, is the best method found yet for the distribution of wealth. Ninety per cent of the cost of nearly every product is labor; therefore, the better wages are, the more money is paid out and distributed; and general business is better. We are paying in wages about seven thousand five hundred million dollars per annum, or twenty millions daily. If a low rate of interest, such as proposed in the bill, should operate to reduce wages even one-half of 1 per cent, which would be about one-half cent on a dollar, then the loss to the wage-earners and the country would be much greater than the gain in saving interest by funding the public debt at 2 per cent.

Inasmuch as the sound conclusions reached in the general provisions of the bill have been the result of education for a quarter of a century, why not let the work of education go on in the matter of refunding the public debt until the time is at hand when our bonds mature and we must take such action? Waiting until then will not work any injury. We will be advised by the light of events, and better able to judge than now. The Government owes it to its citizens to provide them at all times with a safe currency; in other words, to see to it that the currency is sound and stable and the volume equal to the needs of business.

There is an unjust prejudice and opposition to national banks throughout the country. Some of the opponents of national banks are clamorous to abolish them outright; others favor taking from them note circulation; but while agreed in opposition they are not united among themselves as to just what kind of currency or money should take the place of national-bank note circulation. These opponents of national banks believe that the prerogative of coining, making, or issuing money belongs to sovereignty and should be exercised exclusively by the Government and never be given to the banks. The senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] says—open the mints to the free coinage of silver; that this is the remedy and would supply all the needed currency. The senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] says, in effect, let the Government issue fiat money; while some Populists, I believe, wish money issued against deposits of wheat and other farm products.

If the national banks should be abolished or required to give up note circulation and the Government should issue and control the circulating medium, then it seems to me that the best and safest form of currency which the country enjoys, and the one against which there is no prejudice or opposition, is the gold and silver certificates issued against gold and silver deposits in the Treasury. There is now, in round numbers, in the Treasury about $105,000,000 of gold, and $414,000,000 in silver dollars and $80,000,000 of silver bullion, making $494,000,000 of silver. The gold in the Treasury is par all over the world, and, counting silver worth 60 cents in gold, would make the $494,000,000 of silver worth $296,400,000 in gold. Here is already in the Treasury gold and silver of the actual value of about $700,000,000. Against this there were outstanding on July 31 last in gold certificates $208,213,819, and in silver certificates $405,363,504, making $613,577,323, which, under present conditions and the pledge of the Government, is the best and safest money in the world.

The production of gold is increasing so rapidly throughout the world that we are authorized to believe that the amount in the Treasury will increase more rapidly than heretofore. If so, and without much further legislation, what is to hinder the increase of gold certificates against the increasing gold in the Treasury? There can be no question but these certificates would pass current as money all over the world. In this way the solution of the money question could be reached on a basis that should be satisfactory to all and take it forever out of politics. Within a year gold has increased in the Treasury $120,000,000. At this rate in ten years there will be added to the gold now in the Treasury $1,200,000,000. If certificates of deposit should be issued against this gold, these certificates, together with the outstanding silver and gold certificates and subsidiary coin, would give the country a circulating medium about equal to the present volume of currency, not including United States notes or greenbacks, with every promise of increasing as the production of gold increases.

Under present conditions, and even the more favorable ones promised in the bill before the Senate, note circulation of national banks may disappear, partly because it is not profitable now to the banks and may not be even under the provisions of this bill, and partly because of the prejudice and opposition on the part of a large portion of the people to national banks issuing currency; but largely, and more than all this, for the reason there will be no need of bank-note circulation in case the increase of certificates against gold deposits in the Treasury should continue. To my mind gold certificates with a reasonable amount of silver certificates issued under proper restrictions will be the money of the future. If the law is not already clear, make it clear that any person in the United States, in our new possessions, or elsewhere, having gold dollars or gold bullion can deposit the same in the Treasury of the United States and get a certificate redeemable in gold. Such a certificate would pass current as money throughout the world. This would leave to the Government the sole power of issuing money. Therefore, I conclude that it is not needful to fund the public debt before our bonds mature by offering inducements to national banks to take a 2 per cent bond that can not be redeemed under thirty years, and the payment of nearly $90,000,000 in premiums to holders of bonds to exchange the same for the proposed 2 per cent bond.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question, but I did not wish to interrupt him during the course of the speech.

Mr. ELKINS. I shall be glad to hear the Senator's question.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator has stated that the gold certificates would be good all over the world. I want to ask the Senator if the greenback is not just as good as the gold certificate?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes; because it is redeemable in gold, and you can get gold for it. That is the reason why it is as good as gold.

Mr. TELLER. And I suppose the only reason why the gold certificates are as good as gold is because you can get gold for them.

Mr. ELKINS. That is so. I am not objecting to the greenbacks, for it was with them the war was fought and the Union saved, and I have great respect for them. As long as the present arrangement exists, which makes the greenback under the pledge of the Government as good as gold, I do not oppose them; but I think the time will come when they will be redeemed by gold and disappear from our currency. They are as good as gold. I have no difference with my friend from Colorado on that point.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] has given notice of his intention to speak at 2 o'clock to-day, but he is not now in the Chamber. If there is no other Senator ready to speak upon the financial bill, I suggest that we go on with the Calendar until 2 o'clock. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills on the Calendar under Rule VIII until 2 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

NATIONAL CEMETERY AT DOVER, TENN.

Mr. BATE. The bill (S. 79) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Dover, Tenn., was passed over when it was last reached on the Calendar. The bill has passed the Senate four different times, and there is no contest about it. I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 79) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Dover, Tenn.

Atkins for personal injuries sustained by the parting of a guy to a derrick owned by the United States while being used by the War Department in the construction of the two-gun battery at Portland Head, in the town of Cape Elizabeth, Me., provided he produces evidence satisfactory to the Secretary that he has paid said judgment.

Mr. SPOONER. What does the bill propose to do?

Mr. COCKRELL. It proposes to pay some claims against Spain, arising during the war, and to pay the full amount of the claims as presented to the State Department, without ever having any further investigation; and I shall be prepared to offer a few feeble remarks when it comes up.

Mr. SPOONER. I doubt if the Senator from Missouri will be prepared to offer any feeble remarks.

L. C. KENT AND JOSEPH JENKINS.

The bill (S. 983) for the relief of Lindley C. Kent and Joseph Jenkins, as the sureties of Frank A. Webb, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. NELSON January 25, 1900, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom has been referred the bill (S. 983) for the relief of the sureties of Frank A. Webb, respectfully report as follows:

Lindley C. Kent and Joseph A. Jenkins, of Wilmington, Del., seek to have repaid to them the penalty exacted from them as sureties of Frank A. Webb upon his bond and contract with the Secretary of War for the construction, erection, and delivery of buildings for the new Port Penn Light Station, on the Delaware River, in the Fourth light-house district. Webb, by his contract, approved by the Secretary of War, June 29, 1895, undertook to complete the above work in five calendar months thereafter. Before the time expired for his thus completing the work Webb absconded, and Kent & Jenkins, as his sureties, took up the work and carried it to completion, and actually completed it by the delivery of the buildings to the representatives of the Light-House Board and the Government's acceptance thereof on the 11th day of February, 1896, or seventy-seven days after the date of completion and delivery specified in the contract. For this delay Kent & Jenkins, as the sureties of Webb, were charged by the Light-House Board a penalty of $20 a day, making a total of $1,540. Through this delay the Government was subjected to an expense, for pay of inspectors and traveling expenses of inspectors and assistant engineers, of $419.83.

The object of this bill is to authorize the repayment to Kent & Jenkins of so much of this penalty as was in excess of the actual extra expense thereby caused to the United States.

It appears from the evidence submitted to the committee that the default, under this contract, in the first instance, was that of Webb alone, the principal, and that his sureties, Kent & Jenkins, immediately upon ascertaining that Webb had abandoned the work, took it up themselves and carried it to completion. It further appears from the evidence that, independent of the work done by Webb, under the contract—

Kent & Jenkins expended in material and labor thereon the sum of		$5,179.53
The contract price of the building was	$4,400.00
Penalty for delayed completion, 77 days, at $20	1,540.00
Leaving a balance received from the Government by Kent & Jenkins of		2,900.00
Thereby making a net loss to the sureties of		2,279.53

The Government inspector is of the opinion that the work could not be duplicated for less than $5,000.

It further appears that no loss of any other character was sustained by the Government by such delay in the completion of the work for the reason that the light-house in question is situated on the Delaware River, at a point already well lighted, and where there was no danger of shipwreck or other loss of shipping for want of such construction, nor did any such wreck or loss occur during the period of default.

For a further elucidation of this subject the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury and the letters of Mr. Bixby, the engineer in charge of the district in which the light-house is situated, are hereto appended and made a part of this report.

Your committee recommend the adoption and passage of a substitute substantially in the form of Senate bill No. 3348, second session Fifty-fourth Congress, referred to in the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of the said Senate bill No. 767.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill may retain its place on the Calendar. I have an amendment, but I am not prepared just at this time to offer it. I am not sure I will desire to offer it, but I do not want the bill to lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

Mr. McBRIDE. I understand the delay will not be more than a day or so?

Mr. COCKRELL. No. I shall be able to-morrow to determine what I will do about the amendment.

RANK OF MILITARY ATTACHÉS.

The bill (S. 7) to fix the rank of military attachés was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over, retaining its place.

ROBERT J. SPOTTSWOOD ET AL.

The bill (S. 165) for the relief of Robert J. Spottswood and the heirs of William C. McClellan, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-eight" and insert "fifteen;" in the same line, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "seven;" and in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixty" and insert "thirty-one;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Robert J. Spottswood and the heirs of William C. McClellan, deceased, of Colorado, $15,731, as additional compensation for transporting the United States mail from Morrison to Fairplay, and from Fairplay to Leadville, in the State of Colorado, by the said Spottswood and McClellan, from the 1st day of September, 1878, to the 10th day of September, 1879.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the report be read.

The Secretary read the report, submitted by Mr. CARTER (for Mr. GEAR) January 8, 1900, as follows:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 165) for the relief of Robert J. Spottswood and the heirs of William C. McClellan, deceased, respectfully report:

A precisely similar bill was favorably reported and passed in the Fifty-fifth Congress upon the following report, which is adopted by your committee as their report upon the bill under consideration:

"This is a claim for the transmission of mails in Colorado. The said McClellan and Spottswood, in 1878 and 1879, were the contractors for carrying the mails over route No. 38122, from Morrison to Fairplay, in the State of Colorado; that at the time the said contract was taken the daily weight of mail matter handled by said contractors did not exceed an average weight of 150 pounds. On or about the 1st day of September, 1878, the weight of mail matter began to increase, and in a very short time they were handling a daily average weight of about 2,000 ponnds, said increase being wholly without warning or expectation. At the time of said increase the Denver and South Park Railroad was completed on said route from Morrison to Fairplay to a point known as Deer Valley, and their duties as carriers of said mail was to that extent lessened and destroyed. The said firm carried the mails from Deer Valley to Fairplay for about a year, at an average increase of expense and loss to them of a large amount of money. Said increase was occasioned by the sudden and marked growth of the town of Leadville, the mail matter of said city passing over this said route. The said city of Leadville grew from a small mining camp to a city of 15,000 people in a very few months, and said enormous increase could not have been foretold by the said contractors or by the Department.

"This claim is verified by the sworn statements of said Spottswood and McClellan, and also verified by the sworn statements of many people, among others A. B. Crook, of Denver, who was postmaster at Fairplay; William Griffith, who was local agent of said Spottswood and McClellan; William N. Byers, postmaster in the city of Denver; A. A. Smith, postmaster in the city of Leadville, and Gen. Charles A. Adams, who was State agent of the Post-Office Department at Denver during the time the said contractors had this route, all of whom testify to the fact that the mail increased from 150 pounds per day to over 2,000 pounds per day, as claimed by the said contractors; also that the said Spottswood and McClellan made application to the Post-Office Department for increased pay to meet the increased expense, but they were informed that there was no way in which the weight of the mails carried over said route could be ascertained, as no records were kept."

When this measure was formerly reported by this committee, the sum recommended, after careful consideration of all the facts, as a proper appropriation for the relief of Spottswood and McClellan was upward of $28,000. Since that time, however, the original documents which substantiated and proved by evidence procured many years ago the justice of this claim have been unaccountably lost or mislaid, and, owing to the death of the persons supporting the claim, can not now be replaced. Your committee, therefore, omitted all these items and have included only the amount clearly shown by existing documents to be justly due.

After a careful examination of these, the committee are of the opinion that the sum of $15,731 is a just and proper amount to be allowed, and, as so amended, recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. ALDRICH. Fifteen thousand dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifteen thousand seven hundred and thirty-one dollars.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the amendment. The original amount was $28,000. The question is on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 945) for the purchase and construction of a launch for the customs service at and in the vicinity of Astoria, Oreg., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase or have constructed for the customs service a suitable launch, of such motive power as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, for use at and in the vicinity of Astoria, Oreg., and appropriates $5,000 to purchase or build such vessel.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMPROVEMENT OF PEARL HARBOR, HAWAII.

The bill (S. 2708) to amend an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1899, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 1 of the act by adding at the end of the paragraph making an appropriation for the improvement of Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, the following language:

To be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS ROSBRUGH.

The bill (S. 557) for the relief of Thomas Rosbrugh was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Commissioner of the General Land Office to permit Thomas Rosbrugh, of St. Clair County, Mo., to enter 160 acres of public land, subject to entry under the homestead or settlement laws, not mineral nor in the actual occupation of any settler, in lieu of the southeast quarter of section 24, in township 38, of range 27 west, in St. Clair County, Mo.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE UNIVERSITY OF KANSAS.

The bill (S. 76) for the relief of the University of Kansas was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that on or about the 20th day of May, 1856, Deputy United States Marshal and Sheriff Jones, with a posse, acting directly on the findings of the United States grand jury, called by Judge Lecompte of the United States court, sitting at Lecompton, entered the town of Lawrence and destroyed the Free State Hotel, owned by the New England Emigrant Aid Company; and some time thereafter the company presented a claim for damages in the amount of $20,000 to the United States Government; and the company, before its dissolution, transferred that claim to the University of Kansas.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the University of Kansas $20,000, in full settlement of the claim.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator who reported the bill is in his seat, I should like to have an explanation of the measure.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] made the report which accompanies the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Kansas can explain the bill better than I. I also reported the bill at the last session of Congress, and it was passed.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill passed at the last session of Congress. The report is short, if the Senator from Wisconsin desires to have it read.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. ALLEN January 29, 1900:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 76) for the relief of the University of Kansas, of Lawrence, Kans., have had the same under consideration and respectfully report:

Your committee are of opinion that the facts set forth in Senate Report No. 763, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, and passed by the Senate are correctly stated, and adopt the same as a part of this report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 763, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2677) for the relief of the University of Kansas, having carefully examined the evidence in the case and considered all the facts, beg leave to report as follows:

The present beneficiary of this bill, the University of Kansas, a Kansas corporation, is the assignee or transferee of the original claim for damages against the United States sustained by the New England Emigrant Aid Company, a Massachusetts corporation, in 1856.

This claim grew out of the early troubles in Kansas, preceding the late civil war, the material facts and circumstances in relation to it being substantially as follows: On the 21st day of May, 1856, the New England Emigrant Aid Company was the owner in fee of two lots on Massachusetts street, in the city of Lawrence, Kans., on which it had erected a large and well-constructed hotel, thoroughly furnished and equipped, and certain outbuildings. This hotel was three stories high, with a basement, and was known as the "Free State Hotel" or "Eldridge House." It was said at the time to have been the finest hotel west of St. Louis, and, together with its furniture and the other buildings, was worth about $25,000.

On the 5th day of May, 1856, the grand jury of Douglas County, Kans., made a presentment against this structure, in which it was set forth that the same was a nuisance and had "been constructed with a view to military occupation and defense, thereby endangering the public safety and encouraging rebellion and sedition in the country," and they thereby recommended that the nuisance be abated.

Thereupon, on the 21st day of May, 1856, a deputy United States marshal, claiming to act under the authority of the United States district court for the Territory, assembled a large posse and razed the structure to the ground, making it a total loss.

It seems to be clearly demonstrated that this action of the grand jury, on which the deputy United States marshal assumed to act, was unjustifiable, and the destruction of the property by positive and direct orders of the officers of the United States was therefore clearly unwarrantable.

The New England Emigrant Aid Company memorialized Congress several times on the subject and sought to have a reimbursement of the loss it had sustained, but not succeeding in its own right, and despairing of ever being able to secure anything for itself out of this claim, recently assigned the same to the present beneficiary of this bill.

In the light of all the facts, which are more elaborately set forth in a memorial of the University of Kansas and its exhibit, which is attached to this report as Exhibit A and made a part of it, and for the reason that the assignor was a nonresident of the Territory and could not have been guilty as charged of the offenses against the Government, and since the amount of this claim is but $20,000, which is $5,000 less than the value of the property destroyed, your committee are of opinion that the claim is a proper and just one for allowance by the United States, and therefore recommend that the bill as offered in the Senate do pass.

EXHIBIT A.

A MEMORIAL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF KANSAS IN SUPPORT OF SENATE BILL NO. 2677.

A memorial of the University of Kansas, assignee of the New England Emigrant Aid Company, praying indemnification for the destruction of the Free State Hotel at Lawrence, Kans., on the 21st day of May, 1856, by officers of the United States.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialist respectfully represents the following material facts in support of its claim against the United States of America for the indemnity herein specified:

(1) The University of Kansas is a corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Kansas (see Exhibit A), created for the purpose of providing the inhabitants of the State with the means of acquiring a thorough knowledge of the various branches of literature, science, and the arts, and is the assignee of the New England Emigrant Aid Company.

(2) The New England Emigrant Aid Company is a corporation duly organized and existing by virtue of an act of the legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts approved February 24, 1855. (See Exhibit B.)

(3) The said New England Aid Company, of which, at the time of the events recited in this memorial, John C. Brown, of Providence, R. I., was president, and Thomas H. Webb, of Boston, was secretary, was on the 21st day of May, 1856, the owner in fee simple of lots Nos. 21 and 23, on Massachusetts street, in the city of Lawrence, State of Kansas (then Territory), as shown by the deed from the Lawrence Town Company to the said New England Emigrant Aid Company. (See Exhibit C.)

(4) On the said lots Nos. 21 and 23 on Massachusetts street, in the city of Lawrence, was located on the said 21st day of May, 1856, a hotel commonly known as the "Free State Hotel" or "Eldridge House," which was the property of the said New England Emigrant Aid Company.

(5) The value of said hotel on said day was $25,000, apart from the value of the land and the equipment of the hotel, as shown by the books of the said corporation on file with the Historical Society of the State of Kansas, and also by affidavits of the secretary, Thomas H. Webb, and the commercial agent, Samuel C. Pomeroy, of said company, hereto appended. (See Exhibit D.)

(6) The said Free State Hotel was destroyed by bombardment and fire by Deputy United States Marshal Samuel J. Jones, aided by a large posse, claiming to act as deputy United States marshal, and under the authority of the first district court of the United States for Kansas Territory, sitting at Lecompton, Kans. T., Samuel D. LeCompte, judge, on the said 21st day of May, 1856. (See Exhibit E.)

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

JOSHUA T. ROBERTS.

The bill (S. 1749) for the payment to Joshua T. Roberts of balance due for surveying public lands, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $884.82 for the payment to Joshua T. Roberts of the balance due him from the United States for making survey No. 425, in the State of Washington.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALDRICH. The time has expired in which the Calendar was to be before the Senate for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, the provisions of the bill under consideration have no direct relation to the question of bimetallism, and in no respect affect its present aspect or the possibilities of its future attainment. Nevertheless, in the public mind all currency measures, because of recent party issues, assume a political hue and are popularly supposed to have some bearing upon what is known as the "silver question." For this reason it seems to me an opportune time, in addition to a few words respecting the scheme and purpose of the pending bill, to express briefly some views upon the general principles of bimetallism, especially as affected by recent European action, and the attitude of the two political parties in this country upon this important and far-reaching question.

The bill as it came to us is radically changed and modified, and a substitute bill reported. For the purposes of this debate, and until the bill, if it passes, shall return from conference, argument is alone applicable to the Senate bill, for when the measure leaves this Chamber it will undoubtedly bear upon it the stamp and impress which the Finance Committee of the Senate have placed upon it, and that bill alone is under practical consideration here.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], chairman of the Finance Committee, in opening the debate gave us in a speech of remarkable lucidity the plan and scope of the bill. With much that he said nearly every Senator on this side of the Chamber was in sympathy. Other conclusions some of us can not share. For instance, the first section of the bill is, as every Senator must know, surplusage and wholly needless. I refer to the provision reciting the contents of the gold dollar and declaring that it shall continue to be the standard unit of value. Of course it will, and it would so continue if this section were eliminated from the bill. We might as well gravely pass a law providing that a yard shall continue to be 3 feet in length, or that in the future, as in the past, an acre of land should contain 160 square rods. Its reenactment changes in no single respect existing law, and its presence in the bill can only be accounted for by assuming that the committee think men are like children and need to be frequently reassured that everything is all right, as the idea formerly prevailed in primitive communities that the people slept better if they were aroused at midnight by the town crier ringing his bell and informing them that it was 12 o'clock and that all was well. The section has been the law since 1873, and is hardly worth discussing now.

The following section of the bill increasing the gold reserve and effectually preventing for the future the ability of banks and individuals to draw out at will the gold in the Treasury through the endless chain of the greenbacks, now reissued as soon as received, is, in my opinion, an excellent provision and one of value in precluding the future depletion of the gold in the Treasury in those times of depression and panic which periodically overtake the country; and it should assist in avoiding the necessity of issuing additional bonds to protect the reserve.

The silver and silver certificates, as provided for in the bill, rest upon a footing entirely separate and apart from the other metallic money in the Treasury. Their legal-tender quality is left to them. There is a discrimination concerning them, not necessarily discrimination against them. The terms of redemption upon which they were issued are not changed; but to make them more in demand it is provided that hereafter no bills under $10 shall be issued by any of the national banks or by the Government, and the burden of all the small bills of the country shall fall upon these certificates. There is no objection to that provision. It does not injure or affect in the slightest degree the negotiability, the legal-tender qualities, or the value, or the standing of the silver certificates.

There is, however, one limitation respecting them that the committee within the next few months or year will, in my opinion, have to legislate respecting. There are now outstanding some $394,000,000 of silver certificates. There are now outstanding in small bills of all characters by the Government, including the silver certificates now out below that denomination, some $391,000,000, as I compute it. If the increase comes to the national-bank circulation that must come under the provisions of this bill, there will have to be some legislation within the next few months providing either for some addition to the silver fund out of which further silver certificates shall be issued or some provision compelling the issue of small bills applicable to some other notes of issue or some other fund now in the Treasury.

The provision requiring the payment of the principal and interest of the new bonds in gold represents, I think, a mistaken view as to our national credit. From the point of view of bimetallism the provision is serious only in that it is an apparent discrimination in favor of the one metal and against the lawful money of the country. Upon the reestablishment of a bimetallic basis it will make no difference as to the terms employed or the metal named in the bond, for the two metals will be interchangeable. It is true that the Government is but following a fashion which has prevailed in this country for nearly a score of years. Four-fifths of our railroad bonds, aggregating a far greater sum than the amount contemplated by this bill, the bonds of almost every industrial and manufacturing company, municipal and county loans all over the land, and countless mortgages made by individuals are, by their terms, specifically payable in gold. The framers of the bill assert that by the insertion of this clause the bonds can be floated at a lower rate of interest than would otherwise be required. It may be so. My home is somewhat west of the money-lending belt, but I can not but express my regret that the committee felt that the exigencies of the money market required a departure from the terms heretofore used in Government obligations.

It must, however, be a great source of pride to every citizen in this land, to whatever party he may belong, to realize the fact that these United States can go into the markets of the world and place their securities at par at a lower rate of interest than can any other Government on either continent. No other country approaches ours in this regard. England comes nearest, and her consols, now selling nearly at par, pay 2¼ per cent. And it must not be forgotten that these bonds are issued at a time when money is in greater demand all over the world than ever before. In Germany, where there is to-day wonderful prosperity, so great is the demand for money that her Prussian bonds, drawing 3 per cent, an unquestioned security, sell in the markets at 95 or less, and the new Saxony bonds, also drawing 3 per cent, and an equally good bond, were marketed at 85. It must be admitted that in the ability to place the new 2 per cent bonds at par we are greatly aided by the provisions of the bill making them attractive to the national banks of the country; but that we can accomplish it under any circumstances is a gratifying indication of popular confidence in our institutions and our financial integrity.

The other important feature of the bill is the one providing for the exchange of the bonds for those now outstanding and permitting more favorable terms for their use by the national banks of the country as a basis for national-bank circulation.

The national banks had their rise when this Government needed support in carrying out the resumption of specie payments. By means of them we succeeded where we might otherwise have failed. Succeeding years have only more firmly implanted them as an integral part of our financial system, not to be uprooted without a more radical change of policy than any party or administration would care to attempt. The whole argument is too ancient and threadbare for me to enter into here. If this Government were new and were to outline its financial policy, most of us, I take it, would favor some plan akin to that followed by the leading countries of Europe, or the issue of all its money direct by the Government; but the national-bank system has become so intricately interwoven into our financial fabric that there seems no way but to accept them and to utilize them. We provide that hereafter circulation may issue to the par of all bonds deposited for that purpose, thus at once giving us some $20,000,000 of additional circulation. We favor the exchange of old into new bonds by levying but half the tax on them that is imposed where the older bonds are deposited, and by this means it is believed the exchange will be greatly facilitated and hastened. Under these favorable terms it is estimated that within the next few months at least two hundred millions of additional national-bank circulation will follow the passage of the bill. There is no department of human industry to-day in the United States, and in the rest of the world as well, that is not suffering because of an insufficient volume of money and which would not be benefited by a legitimate enlargement of the currency. Under our existing gold standard there seems to be no other available method of giving us this greatly needed increase than the one favored by this bill.

There is, however, a serious objection to all national-bank circulation, both present and prospective—an objection which the passage of this bill will sooner or later accentuate and make more apparent. The money of the world in use by the commercial nations dealing outside their borders, and having the same standard, must necessarily be fairly distributed among them. Later I hope to dwell more at length upon this undoubted fact. We can not keep more than our distributive proportion of money, and any enlargement of our paper circulation must necessarily lead to the loss of some of our gold. The paper will, of course, remain here, but when the kiting times which will follow a large increase in our paper shall have ended, as they must, then, perhaps spasmodically, but surely, a proportionate share of the gold in the country must go abroad. Two hundred millions of increase in national-bank paper means perhaps the loss, on that account, of one hundred millions of gold. We need more money, but the increase should be in the metals and not in paper.

I have thus summarized briefly, Mr. President, the important features of the bill under discussion. It is not ideal legislation.

Looking to the currency problems of the whole world, all legislation of the character contemplated by this bill is to those who believe in the principles of bimetallism unwise, because under the beneficent working of the bimetallic system it would be unnecessary. It is but one more step to be eventually retraced. This country has less to answer for than any other of the great commercial countries of the world, for we were the last to abandon silver, and it may be that by legislation which protects us and our national credit, in the general scramble for gold and the repudiation of silver, we are really, though unconsciously, fighting the battle of international bimetallism, but our course can only be justified upon the theory that we are acting in self-defense. Upon that theory, and because alone we seem at this time powerless to restore silver to its parity with gold at the old ratio, and judging the wisdom of the proposed legislation upon the basis that our mints are now open to gold and closed to silver, there are to my mind advantages apparent in the provisions of the bill over existing law.

But, Mr. President, the enactment of this measure into law without at the same time accompanying it with a reaffirmance of the position of the Republican party respecting international bimetallism would be an apparent abandonment of the principles and policy of the party, and no language of the supporters of the bill could change or obliterate this inevitable conclusion; and the amendment reported by the Finance Committee conveys a positive assurance to the world that this country, able to hold its own among the nations of the earth, with gold as its standard, is still ready to meet and treat with the other leading commercial countries looking to an international agreement to open the mints of the world to silver as well as gold.

I realize, Mr. President, that these seem unpropitious days for those of us who cherish a belief in bimetallism and faith in its final triumph. These are prosperous times. The enormous increase in the gold output has revived industry and stimulated manufactures and business and raised prices all over the world, and especially in this country, where we have had the added stimulus of an excellent protective tariff and a wise and conservative administration of public affairs. The prosperity is real, is universal, and I trust may be long continued. But the experience of generations have taught us that cycles of depression and stagnation follow periods of prosperity as inevitably as the night follows the day. We observe the injunction of that wisest of men who bade us, "In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider." The reaction is sure to come; when it does, public interest will be again aroused to consider the wisdom of a policy which would do more than any other to ameliorate and lessen the hard times which seem the invariable attendant of our commercial life, and it is important that we be ready for its consideration.

The principles of bimetallism are firmly implanted in the very foundation of the Republican party. For nearly a quarter of a century, with every recurring national convention, we have renewed our declaration of faith in the doctrine. The amendment, together with the law of 1897 creating a commission for negotiation with foreign governments, still in force, is in accord and in line with its former declarations, and furnishes to the people of the United States their only hope for an honest effort toward a restoration of a parity between gold and silver. It is true there are doubt and hostility in certain quarters, but the great mass of the voters of the country are bimetallists, provided always it can be secured without impairment of the national credit. "Truth is the daughter of Time," and sooner or later, when other experiments have failed, the principle will secure adoption by the intelligent nations of the world.

In this country bimetallism has received its greatest injury and suffered its severest blow at the hands of the Bryan Democracy. In close alliance with the Populist party, which still demands an irredeemable and inflated paper currency, clamoring for free silver at 16 to 1 by the United States alone to the exclusion of any other settlement of the question, advocating openly depreciated money, ridiculing all idea of international agreement, associating their demands with a snarling protest against every policy which seeks the enforcement of law and order and the maintenance of the honor of our country and the fulfillment of our obligations to mankind, it is not surprising that they have so clouded the minds of men that many of them, seeing no difference between the free silver of Bryan and real bimetallism, are inclined to seek an end of the whole matter and hesitate to deal with the subject in any form.

But, Mr. President, we can be honest and win.

The failure of the Republican party to stand up for the principles it has always advocated will bring it no additional votes. The Chicago platform offers no hope for bimetallism. There are some gold monometallists in the country of both political parties. They will not vote for Bryan or Bryanism under any circumstances. Accentuating the contrast in the financial demands of the two parties by excluding all reference to international bimetallism would only serve to throw into the shadow the negations and Populistic notions and heterogeneous patchwork of the Democracy now in the saddle, which they call a platform. Our St. Louis declaration of faith and of principles elected Mr. McKinley once, and it will triumphantly reelect him, and I must be pardoned for urging that it is bad politics as well as bad morals for us to change the line of battle in the face of a once-defeated enemy.

When I entered the Senate eleven years ago, and afterwards, I believed and asserted my belief that the United States alone, unaided by any other nation, could establish and maintain for the whole world the parity between gold and silver if it opened its mints to the free coinage of both metals at the old ratio of 16 to 1; and under the conditions then existing, and which seemed certain to follow our action, I still believe it might then have been accomplished. What was true a few years ago is no longer true. The commercial value of silver was then far greater than now; India had but just closed her mints, we believed temporarily; Russia had not declared her ratio of 24 to 1; Japan was still upon the silver standard, and the annual product of gold was normal, showing a slight but steady increase year after year, and the world's supply of the metal money was grossly inadequate. To-day we face a vastly different condition of affairs, and for one I should shrink from entering upon the experiment alone and at the old ratio. Not only the hostility of the vast majority of the taxpayers of our own country, but the attitude of the civilized governments of the world, the existence in India of a thousand million ounces and more of silver, uncoined, sold from day to day in the bazaars, the uncertainty as to the future of the Orient, all these vexed and unsettled problems might well make us pause.

It is not necessary now to discuss further that question, but it is my judgment that if Mr. Bryan were to-day President of the United States, and if a majority of Congress were of his way of thinking, they would never dare seek to impose upon this country the responsibility of entering alone and unaided upon the duty of maintaining a parity at the old ratio.

Those of us who hold pronounced views on bimetallism and who belong to and intend to remain in the ranks of the Republican party, and who, with the adoption of the amendment, intend voting for this bill, do not ask you to face that possibility or to embark upon any uncertain sea. We only ask you to declare to the other leading countries of the world your willingness to consider with them the question of the restoration of bimetallism at some fair ratio. The initiative will probably, and should, come from them and not from us, but it is our duty to leave the door open for them if they seek an entrance, and not to close it against advances which, in my opinion, are certain to be made.

Long usage and experience have taught us that the precious metals are the true basis for money. And experience has also taught us that the two metals circulating concurrently tend the one to equalize the other, to prevent the disturbances naturally caused by an abnormal over or under production of either, and to preserve a stable par of exchange between them.

It has also been abundantly demonstrated that whenever there is a contraction or a lessening in the volume of money, or whenever its supply fails to keep pace with the increased needs for it, growing out of new industries, a widening commerce, the development of new countries and the growth of population, there must follow a lowering of prices, depression in trade, poverty and suffering.

The wonderful discoveries and enormously increased product of gold which the last three years have witnessed furnish the latest proof of the truth of this statement, so often verified as to have become axiomatic. And, Mr. President, if this great output of gold shall continue and increase, as it bids fair to do, it will go a long way toward making permanent that general rise in values which is now bringing the world prosperity.

But even so, Mr. President; if the Transvaal, when days of peace shall return in that region now devastated by war, should quadruple its output; if the Klondike and Cape Nome shall rival the Rand in wealth; and the wonderful gold production in Cripple Creek and throughout our mining regions continues and increases, as there is every reason to believe it will, it is still true that every civilized gold-using country which relies upon agriculture or which may compete with the silver-using countries in the labor employed in its mills and manufactories will still suffer great and destructive disadvantage until at some fair ratio the two metals again march side by side.

It is impossible for us who live in a country whose people are intelligent, alert, educated, and interested in all questions which affect the habitable globe, closely connected with each other by railways, and enlightened by thousands of printed newspapers, to comprehend the existence of the hundreds of millions of human beings who people India and Asia. If their life and habits of thought and rules of conduct are an enigma to us, ours are a far greater mystery to them. For more than one hundred and fifty years England has dominated India and has made hardly an impression upon its life and people.

The great Empire of China is to the whole world practically unknown. They know nothing and care less for our civilization. Theirs is to them grander and nobler and more complete. Honeycombed with ancient traditions and customs, from father to son they know no change. The coin that suffices to remunerate their labor to-day has been the measure of their pay for generations. Our commerce, our laws, our economic systems have hardly touched the surface of their lives. Our commercial intercourse with them leaves no more impress upon the calm waters of their national existence than do our argosies upon the trackless seas that wash their shores, and long after we shall be buried in oblivion those great masses of humanity will continue in their ancient traditions and usages, untouched and unaffected by our modern civilization.

Their grain with which this country actively competes, the fruit of their constantly increasing looms and manufactories which are sold side by side with ours in the markets of Europe, in small volume now, but each year in steadily increasing quantities, for gold and exchanged for silver at nearly two dollars for one, will still be produced at a cost measured by silver, not as it is valued to-day, but having nearly the same purchasing power it had thirty years ago.

The question assumes even greater importance since our acquisition of the Philippines. Here are 5,000,000 of people knowing only silver, living in the region of silver-using countries, with whom we are to deal, for whom we must furnish a means of exchange recognized by the merchants of the whole world and secured as well by the faith and credit of the United States, and we can never impose upon them a gold standard and a gold currency without destroying their ability to compete with the other countries of the Orient.

It used to be said, when silver was so largely overproduced in proportion to gold, that there was not enough gold in the world to make it certain that silver would not become the cheaper metal, as monometallists term it, and drive out the gold from circulation. Every dollar of gold added to the world's supply lessens this danger, which was apparent and not real, and the greater the supply and increase in the gold product of the world, the more essential it is that the possibility of its fluctuation should be guarded and regulated by the circulation as money of its sister metal. It is said that in the Rand alone there are upwards of two thousand million dollars of gold already in sight. Distant as the prospect may seem, you may yet find it essential to establish a parity between the two metals so that gold shall not fall in value below the ratio.

It seems to me idle to say that the question is national and not one equally affecting the other commercial nations of the world and inviting their active cooperation and approval. As long as a country is without foreign commerce the character of her money is a matter of national concern alone. Whenever a nation deals with the other countries of the world and has debts to pay and credits to receive, the character and volume of the money of the countries with which she trades become of immediate importance in arriving at a medium of exchange. The vast gold product of the Rand is coined in foreign mints, but an unappreciable amount of it reaches ours, and yet the increase in metallic money, because of the added available gold product, is largely accountable for our prosperity and for the recent increase in the price of both goods and wages. Our distributive share comes to us and is dependent not alone on population, but as well upon the character and extent of our industrial and commercial transactions and upon the habits of our people respecting the amount of actual money we use.

Year after year our relations with other countries are becoming more closely interwoven; we are intimately concerned in their welfare; the markets to-day reflect the advance or the checks of the British armies in South Africa; a panic in Paris or Berlin or London seriously disturbs values here, and every question affecting our financial policy is more and more an international one. We are rapidly forging to the front, not only as the greatest commercial nation in the world, but as its financial center. If heaven blesses us with one or two years more of bountiful crops, we shall become for all time a creditor and no longer a debtor nation, and able to influence the world's financial policy as never before in our history.

Our foreign commerce is marching with giant strides. It needs no prophet's vision to foretell a future which shall witness our sails on every sea, our manufactures competing successfully in every land, our inventions still more generally adopted, our labor, the most intelligent and productive in the world, finding remunerative employment in the manufactured articles sold abroad; our vast agricultural areas developed to their fullest capacity, furnishing food to millions of people beyond our borders, carried on American ships manned by American seamen. Who shall say that we are not interested in the financial resources and policy of every country in the world and that it is not of vital importance that we shall aid in securing some universal international system which shall be free from sudden change and fluctuation, or that great questions of financial policy, upon which depend the prosperity and therefore the happiness of our people, are not international questions?

There have been three international conferences upon the subject of bimetallism, and failure has been written opposite each.

The conference of 1878 was held too soon after the change which Germany had made in her financial policy. That Empire refused to participate, France held aloof, and England attended only through courtesy.

The conference of 1881, called at the invitation of France and the United States, following close upon the heels of the former one, added much to the world's knowledge of the subject, but continental politics still played an important part, and no conclusion was reached.

The conference of 1892, summoned at our invitation, at the head of which the President designated the able and distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], was doomed from the first, although at the outset it seemed full of promise. The Conservative party in England, in general sympathy with the movement, went out of power between the time when the law was enacted authorizing the representation of Great Britain and the time when the delegates were named. Mr. Gladstone, prime minister, was hostile, and both the English delegation and the instructions which accompanied them were unfavorable. France, content with her system, lent an unwilling ear and a tardy approval of the conference. Germany allied herself with England in the announcement that she would make no change in her standard. Nothwithstanding the ability of the delegation from this country, no result could be attained, and the conference adjourned, nominally to meet again, but never resumed its sessions.

Meanwhile, in 1895, the three great countries of England, Germany, and France, either unanimously or by an overwhelming majority in their parliaments, declared their desire to cooperate with the other powers in an international conference for the purpose of removing or mitigating the constant fluctuations and growing divergence in the relative value of gold and silver. It was because of those resolutions by these three great powers, as well as in the fulfillment of the pledge of the St. Louis platform and the principles or the Republican party, that in 1897 one more attempt was made to settle this question.

Mr. President, I do not intend to go into the facts concerning the commission abroad or the preliminary trip which preceded it. I took the time of the Senate nearly two years ago with a very full description of what took place. But the lapse of time, perhaps, permits me to mention one or two facts which may be of interest in the Senate. The position of France has been quoted by one or two speakers during the course of this debate. The position of France was that she was bimetallic, and that under no conceivable circumstances would France make a change in her financial system unless important concessions could first be obtained from England; and without concessions from England, including the opening of the India mint, France would not proceed further.

There was another fact which lapse of time permits me to state without embarrassment to anybody, and that is the undoubted fact that when our envoys—for there was no conference called—had their interviews with the English ministry in the late summer of 1897, before the proposals which we had made were forwarded to India, the English ministry were of the unanimous opinion that the India authorities would quickly avail themselves of our offers, and that the result of our proposals would be the acceptance of them. That fact is as undoubted as any fact in existence. When people talk here of the futile efforts of the envoys, they little realize how near to the achievement of success we came.

There is one further fact of greater importance in view of what I am going to say, and that is that I sincerely believe that if we had then been in a position, either in the summer before our proposals went to India, or afterwards, upon their return, to negotiate with the English Government upon the basis of a change of ratio, not great, not enormous, but something of a change to meet the altered conditions, we might still then have come back with an agreement executed and not with failure. But we were not at liberty so to do. The hostility that prevailed here would have prevented.

Mr. President, it is undoubtedly true that our final success was perhaps neither furthered nor hindered by the attitudes and actions of parties and individuals on this side of the water. But there was nothing left undone by the extremists on both sides to injure and destroy our usefulness and the possibility of our success.

I do not care again to refer to the action of Administration subordinates. Above them all was the President of the United States, and it is beyond any question that he, as well as the ambassadors abroad, cordially and zealously cooperated with the commission, gave us a free hand and the fullest power.

There are, however, some facts concerning the attitude of the followers of Mr. Bryan toward an attempt to secure an international agreement, not only while we were abroad but since, of which it is pertinent to speak at this time and which clearly indicate the policy of his party respecting this question.

There were notable exceptions. I spoke of some of them when I came back, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] and others, who cordially seconded our efforts; but even on the preliminary journey, before we went away, the then Senator from Utah, Mr. Cannon, felt pretty bad to think we had gone, and talked of it as the "dilettante dalliance with the question," and spoke of our "genuflections before the throne of foreign finance."

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], always earnest in this question, always able in its presentation, still felt that our country was losing some of its republican characteristics if we should be willing to speak with people who lived under a monarchy; and he said:

> The picture of the great republican people of America roaring "as gently as any sucking dove," through the haunts of Lombard street, and seeking interviews with the magnates of foreign finance with the piteous wail that the American people may take this matter in their own hands unless some dole of concession be given them, is an impressive picture which should be put into the Rotunda of the Capitol.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] felt very badly about it, and he said:

> I want the time to come when the sending of ambassadors to Europe to supplicate the crowned heads to allow us to legislate for own country shall stop.

And he thought—> it is so unpatriotic, so un American, to go to Europe to get legislation for this country that I can not look upon it with any favor. I can not look upon it but as a calamity.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], of course, was against us. And he said, among other things:

> I do not believe we should longer be suppliants at the feet of European nations.

And then he delivered himself of that doctrine which has been again and again reiterated by the adherents of Mr. Bryan. He said, "Suppose we could not maintain the parity. What harm would it do us?" He said we would then go into the ranks of the most prosperous people of the world, and he defied mankind to show us a prosperous country on the gold standard, and said our only hope for prosperity was to go as a silver-using country unable to maintain the parity between gold and silver.

Mr. President, I do not care to go into the utterances of that time. The newspapers of the party were filled with every conceivable attack not only on the policy sought to be carried out, but on our good faith in making the endeavor. It has been so from that day to this. Almost every orator, almost every speaker, and almost every newspaper have sought to bring ridicule and contempt upon us and upon our efforts to secure bimetallism by international agreement.

Colorado—I do not mean to speak at length of occurrences in my own State; I only speak of instances there because they are evidence of the position of the Bryan party everywhere. My friend the Senator from Montana and my friend the Senator from Idaho had the same experiences in their States. Mr. President, the fact that I went as an envoy and tried to bring about an international agreement that would bring silver back to coinage was used as an argument to prove that I was a traitor, disloyal to silver, unworthy of my State. I was placarded all over the State, where I have lived since the year I became of age, as a traitor, disloyal to the State I represented, all because I tried to represent her and secure if I could some recognition for silver; and from that time until only the other day, when the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who seems to be now the chief mouthpiece of the Bryan Democracy, denounced our attempt as foolish and ridiculous, there has never been a public utterance by the Bryan party except in hostility to our efforts.

Mr. President, I do not mean to refer at length to Colorado, where there is naturally deep feeling on this question. At some future time I may. But I rejoice to say that there is a radical change taking place not only in Colorado, but in all the far Northwestern States. Our people are tired of hearing only a gospel of hate and sectionalism. We do not pay as much attention as we formerly did to the prophets of despair and doom, who are eternally warning us against the wrath to come, that somehow does not come. We are getting a glimmering shadow of an idea that if we want friendships, and prosperous communities, and capital for our marvelous resources, we are as apt to get them by maintaining cordial relations with the rest of the country, even if they do not fully agree with us on the silver question, as we are by bitter words and savage hate toward everybody who happens to differ with us; and that perhaps the cause of bimetallism is not really furthered by an alliance with people who want to tear up railroads and tear down the Supreme Court, and whose principal mission seems to be to persuade mankind that they are on their way to the poorhouse.

Life is not all cheerfulness and content; but some of it is, and we are going to take ours without waiting for Mr. Bryan, for he may not arrive. The black specter of the "crime of '73" no longer walks abroad in Colorado and keeps us awake nights. It has gone over the range, and we are coming out from the caves of gloom into the open sunshine of hope.

Our Commonwealth is the richest in natural resources in the whole Union, but its chiefest value is in the fact that it lies in the heart of this great free Republic, one of an eternal brotherhood of States, linked together in one common and immortal destiny.

In these attacks upon bimetallism the head of the party has especially distinguished himself. All through the last campaign in Nebraska again and again he denounced as foolish and futile all attempts to secure international bimetallism. And in a speech last summer at Louisville he disclosed fully and fairly his policy. And in his organ, the National Watchman or the national something the speech is reported. It is short, and I must read it. In it he declares and outlines the policy of his followers in respect to bimetallism. Mr. Bryan said:

I believe that independent action will force international bimetallism, and that it is the only way that you will ever bring the nations of the Old World to an international agreement. When our commissioner goes over there, it will not be to petition; it will be to announce the purpose of the American people. He will tell them that 70,000,000 of people have as much right to protect their property from depreciation as a handful of financiers have to legislate more value into the notes and bonds and mortgages they hold. He will tell them that, by the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at 16 to 1, we can maintain the parity between gold and silver; but he will say, if you people doubt it, just remember that you have a good deal of money loaned in the United States that is payable in coin, and that coin means either gold or silver; and remember that if we fail to maintain the parity, it will be because you men conspire to make one of the metals cheap, and if you conspire to decry the value of silver—if you conspire to make gold dearer merely because you want to increase the value of your dollar—we will punish you by paying you in the metal you make cheap.

This is the gentleman whom a great party is to choose as its standard bearer; a gentleman who openly announces that if he were President of the United States, charged with the protection of the nation's honor, he would announce to the governments of Europe that the United States intended opening its mints to silver; that in his opinion the parity would be maintained, but would threaten them if they did not join us, and the experiment failed, we would pay our obligations to them in depreciated money. This is a new doctrine, Mr. President—that of bimetallism by blackmail! It is not surprising in the light of this statement that investors insist on a gold bond, and one can readily understand why Mr. Bryan occupies the most unique and remarkable position of any man in our whole political history. It is but a few months before the national Democratic convention, and his nomination is eagerly desired by both the great political parties. The Democracy wants him, the Republican party wants the Democracy to have him, and he wants himself! [Laughter.]

The only exception among those on the other side of the Chamber who insist that we are humiliated by a bimetallic agreement was in the address of the able Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] a day or two ago. I have a copy of that portion of his speech here, in which he seems to favor international agreement, not for bimetallism, but to raise silver to par, in which he says:

Keep all our metal money at par.

* * * * * * * *

Our present stock of silver can easily be kept at par with gold, as it has been since 1893, now nearly seven years. By the simple process of preserving its legal tender quality we will preserve its par value.

The Senator then proposes, inasmuch as the people seem to want an international agreement, that we make an international agreement with Mexico and Central and South America. I shall be very brief on this point. I can not believe that the Senator from Virginia carefully looked over the figures of Central and South America to see what he would do. In most of those countries you could not find a piece of gold in the country if you went over it with a hoe. There is none there. In most of them silver is at a premium, ranging from 50 per cent to 500 per cent, or from 500 per cent down, and in many of them the standard is silver, and there is not any of that.

In Central America to-day, with a population of 3,400,000, there is at present 30 cents per capita of gold, and in South America there is $1.91 per capita. In 1897 they coined the enormous sum in all South America of $49. That was the total gold coinage of South America, where, with a population of 38,000,000 people, they have got $1,159,000,000 of uncovered paper money. They have got thirty dollars and a half of uncovered paper money to every human being there, and that includes white people, who are few in number and very intelligent, Indians, negroes, zamboes, and all the crossbreeds. For the white people it will average something over $200 per capita of uncovered depreciated paper money.

How in the world any man who desires, as the Senator from Virginia, I know, does, to maintain the parity of the two metals and the credit and good name of the United States can believe that the silver cause can be helped by going into a silver bimetallic agreement with the countries of Central and South America I can not see. The mints of South America are open to gold to-day. You pay 4.61 per cent, I think it is, to coin silver and only 1.41 per cent to coin gold. They will coin you a dollar of gold, which is legal tender; they will coin you a silver dollar, which is legal tender, and you can take the dollar of gold and go into the same treasury and get 2.1 silver dollars. How in the world the Senator from Virginia would seek to bring about a bimetallic agreement with those countries that would do us any good I can not see, but I do not care to go any further into it now.

Mr. President, I do believe that whoever says international bimetallism is dead has not fully familiarized himself with the question. It is true that for the present all negotiations are in check and stopped. England, at an enormous cost to India and enormous cost to herself, is now trying upon that unhappy people an experiment which almost every economic thinker, including most of the bankers and merchants of the city of London, believes must be fraught with disastrous failure. The agricultural interests of England and the population in Lancashire are still adherents of the bimetallic doctrine. In view of the almost certain failure of the India experiment, it is not only my opinion but that of most of the economic thinkers of Europe that there is every probability that within a short period the Empire of England will be very glad to consider the question again.

The Empire of Germany has one great party, the agricultural party, overwhelmingly and practically unanimously bimetallic. Curiously enough the hostility to bimetallism in Germany comes solely and principally from the labor people, the Socialist party. Those who represent labor inscribe in their platforms and upon their banners hostility to bimetallism in any form; but that country has not recently been officially approached. Its writers, thinkers, representatives express the opinion, especially in view of the great prosperity that is attending that country to-day and the great needs for a larger volume of money, which are everywhere evident, and which have reduced the price of her good securities—her bonds—to so low a rate that she also would be glad to consider the question.

With France there would be greater difficulty. That great Republic is becoming more and more indifferent to open mints, because she has a decreasing population and an enormous circulation per capita. The new gold discoveries are adding, if you will notice, month after month, to the preponderance of the gold reserve over the silver reserve in the Bank of France, making her present great stock of silver safer for her to carry; and there is more reluctance and less initiative to-day in the Republic of France than anywhere. But all those countries are ready for international bimetallism if some change of ratio can be made, not large, but in some measure meeting the great difference between the two metals. You must remember that there have been four or five changes of ratio in the history of silver, and that every change has been a moderate increase in the ratio. I believe that soon all those countries will be ready for negotiation; I believe also with beneficent results.

It is my sincere conviction that in our day, and soon, a genuine and united effort will be sought by the leading commercial nations to restore the bimetallic system. The amendment before the Senate informs the world that we stand ready to cooperate. If it is accomplished it can only be through the aid in this country of the party which has ever stood for the maintenance of the national honor and the national credit, and when it comes it will come to bless mankind. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment which I have offered to the pending bill, in the nature of a substitute, be laid before the Senate. It is to be entitled "An act to establish a unit of account and to provide for the coinage of money, and for other purposes."

The amendment submitted by Mr. BUTLER January 15, 1900, is as follows:

That the unit of account shall be dollar, and the fractional parts thereof shall be cent and mill; the cent shall be the one-hundredth part of a dollar, or unit, and the mill shall be the one-thousandth part of a dollar, or unit; and that all the accounts of the Government and of the public offices thereof and all the proceedings in the courts of the United States shall be kept and stated in such unit and fractional parts thereof, namely, dollars, cents, and mills.

SEC. 2. That the money of the United States shall be manufactured or coined out of gold, silver, paper, and copper. The gold coins shall be manufactured out of an alloy of which nine parts by weight shall be pure gold, and one part by weight shall be copper or copper and silver, and shall be known as standard gold. The silver coins shall be manufactured or coined out of an alloy of which nine parts by weight shall be pure silver and one part by weight shall be copper, and shall be known as standard silver. The copper or minor coins shall be manufactured or coined out of an alloy of which three parts by weight shall be copper and one part by weight shall be nickel. The paper money or units shall be manufactured or coined out of paper, the character and quality of which shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That no piece of money coined or manufactured out of gold, silver, or paper shall be greater than twenty dollars or units, and each piece of money manufactured by the United States out of gold, silver, or paper shall be a legal tender for all debts, public and private, at their nominal or face value. The minor coins shall be a legal tender at their nominal or face value for all debts, public and private, in amounts not to exceed one dollar or unit in any single payment.

SEC. 4. That there shall be manufactured or coined out of standard gold the following coins or pieces of money, namely: Twenty dollar or unit pieces, each to be twenty dollars or units, and to contain 516 grains, troy; ten dollar or unit pieces, each to be ten dollars or units, and to contain 258 grains, troy; five dollar or unit pieces, each to be five dollars or units, and to contain 129 grains, troy.

That there shall be manufactured or coined out of standard silver the following coins or pieces of money, namely: Dollar or unit pieces, each to be one dollar or unit, and to contain 412½ grains, troy; one-half dollar or unit pieces, each to be one-half of a dollar or unit, and to contain 206¼ grains, troy; quarter dollar or unit pieces, each to be one-quarter of a dollar or unit, and to contain 103⅛ grains, troy; dimes, each to be one-tenth of a dollar or unit, and to contain 41¼ grains, troy.

SEC. 6. That the minor coins of the United States shall be a 5-cent piece and a 1-cent piece. The 5-cent piece shall be the one-twentieth part of a dollar or unit, and shall contain 80 grains, troy; the 1-cent piece shall be the the one-hundredth part of a dollar or unit, and shall contain 40 grains, troy.

SEC. 7. That any person may bring to the mints of the United States gold or silver bullion to be coined into money, and the same shall be coined into money for him free of charge immediately upon receipt of the same at the mint, and into pieces of such denominations as he may designate, and if he fail to inform the Director of the Mint at the time his bullion is received at the mint what denominations he desires his bullion to be coined into, the same shall be coined into such pieces as the Director of the Mint may direct. All gold and silver bullion which is now owned by, or which may hereafter come into the possession of, the United States, shall be immediately coined into money.

SEC. 8. That the minor coins shall be coined out of material purchased by the Director of the Mint with funds appropriated for that purpose, and the same shall be delivered to any person or persons who may purchase the same of the Government at their nominal or face value.

The minor coins shall bear the same inscriptions as the other coins, except the eagle shall be omitted, and each piece shall be designated as 5 cents or 1 cent, as the case may be.

SEC. 21. That any of the money that may be coined out of paper under this act that shall become mutilated or injured so as to become unfit for use shall, when presented to the Treasurer of the United States by the owner thereof, or when the same shall come into the Treasury of the United States, be taken up and destroyed, and in lieu thereof shall be issued new money coined out of paper.

SEC. 22. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 23. That the title of the act shall be amended to read as follows: "An act to establish a unit of account and to provide for the coinage of money, and for other purposes."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, to properly explain this amendment, which is a substitute bill in toto for the pending bill, and to clear away the false and absurd notions that prevail concerning money would require a volume and therefore much more time than I can devote to it now, although the importance of the subject requires that I should do so.

In many features the amendment follows the bill that was passed April 2, 1792. It provides that the money of the United States shall hereafter be coined out of gold, silver, and paper, and all money except the minor coins shall be a legal tender for all debts, public and private. It also provides for the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the rate established by the act of 1837.

The coinage of money out of paper, while to a certain extent a new feature, yet is demanded by the necessities of modern civilization.

Everything that is used as a medium of exchange is money, of whatever material it may be made. There can be but two kinds of money—one that is manufactured in pursuance of law and the other that is used by common consent. All money that is used by common consent has no power whatever to pay debts, public or private, and can only discharge debts by consent of parties. Money is entirely domestic in its character and is made for the sole use of the people of the country which makes it. Under the Constitution the Congress alone has power to manufacture money, and it is left to Congress to determine what it shall be manufactured out of. There is no limitation upon that power. It can manufacture it out of gold alone or silver alone or out of both metals; it can manufacture it out of paper alone or out of the precious metals and paper; out of one or either, or out of all. The power of Congress is unlimited. Of this there can be no question whatever.

The money that is manufactured by the United States is manufactured ostensibly, at least, for the people of the United States and for nobody else, and none of it can perform the functions of money outside of the United States except by common consent or agreement of parties.

There is no such thing as "the money of the world." Nobody knows this better than those who are so frequently using that term in the interest of contraction. Every nation has its own money, just as it has its own laws. Money is the result of law. There can be no money without law. The law of each country says what the money of that country shall be, and the money made by such law is as domestic in its character as the law itself. There is the money of the United States, but it is only money in the United States. The same is true of the money of Great Britain, the money of France, and the money of every other nation. It can only perform the functions of money within the dominion of that nation. The only way that people of another nation can use the money of this country is by trading with us, for of course we receive our own money from a foreigner as we receive it from each other in exchange for products; but when we, as a nation, pay our balances in trade to other countries we pay them in products and not in money. We pay them in cotton, tobacco, wheat, or manufactured products. If, however, they wanted gold or silver, do we pay them so many gold dollars or so many silver dollars? No; we place the gold or silver in scales and weigh it, just as we weigh cotton or tobacco. The gold and silver that we pay them in is to them a commodity, even if the money stamp is on it. We can pay them in gold bullion or silver bullion without any stamp on it, and they receive it by weight just the same as if the money stamp was on it. So when we pay them in gold and silver we are not paying them in money; we are simply paying them in commodity by weight. When we travel abroad we do not use our money, but we exchange our money for the money of the country in which we travel. We could just as easily change a bale of cotton, if we owned it, into the money of that country. So when I own a bale of cotton there is just as much sense in calling that bale of cotton the cotton of the world as when I own a gold dollar of the United States to call that gold dollar a gold dollar of the world.

Mr. President, the discussion of this amendment involves the whole consideration of the money question, and it ought not to be lightly passed over. The question is not out of what material money shall be manufactured, but the quantity that is to be manufactured and put into circulation. One man may call him a gold man, another may call himself a silver man, another may call himself a greenbacker. No matter what they call themselves, you can divide all men on the financial question into two classes. One side wants money scarcer and dearer; the other wants it more plentiful and wants its volume to increase in proportion to the increase of population and business so as to maintain the stability of prices and the equation between the man and the dollar. Every man occupies one of those two sides on the money question except the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] who has just spoken, and I do not think he himself knows which side he is on.

Mr. President, there is but one vital point in the whole money question, and that is how much is needed. There is unlimited power in Congress to make money. There is unlimited power to make it out of anything—to make it out of diamonds, if you please. We have the power to make it out of diamonds or out of platinum. The only question is how much. The gold man says he wants it of gold. That is because he wants it scarce. There is not an intelligent gold man in America to-day who would not be against gold if the amount of it got plentiful enough to furnish sufficient money. If silver was scarcer than gold, the gold man would at once become a silver man, because he would want the scarcer money. Indeed, it has occurred more than once when the output of gold was very large that the gold men have begun to favor the demonetization of gold.

The only question, Mr. President, is how much, and that is a question which Congress should decide, just as we decide how much taxes shall be collected, and for the same reason. The gold man says, "I am for gold," and yet when I ask him where the gold is coming from, he says, "I do not know; they are getting it now from so and so." "But will it come next year in as large a quantity?" "I do not know." The most ardent gold man in America or in the world must stand up in any audience and confess that the supply is not only limited but precarious. Is it wise to have our money made solely out of a metal that is not only scarce, but the supply of which may be double next year what it is this, or may be half next year what it is this? Population is not liable to the same fluctuations, but, on the other hand, population steadily increases. Then should not the volume of money steadily increase in proportion? Suppose the output of gold should suddenly become very abundant. I would say there would be precisely the same objection to it, because it might suddenly make too much money.

My objection to the gold standard is not only on account of the scarcity of gold, but on account of the precariousness of the output, and therefore the want of stability in prices under the gold standard. My contention is for an amount of money that will meet the needs of the country, regulated by Congress and not depending upon chance; and when that is done, I do not care whether it is made out of gold, silver, paper, copper, or diamonds. It makes but little difference to the country; the country will prosper if Congress will increase the volume each year with the increase of population and business, no matter what it is made out of.

Mr. President, that money is an absolute necessity in civilized communities no one will dispute, and there would never be any discussion of the question if it were not for the fact that there are a small number of people who favor restricting the amount of money in order that the minority of mankind may profit by the millions of wealth producers. The only question to be discussed is how much, how many dollars.

Money is a manufactured article, manufactured by the Government alone, and it is manufactured for certain specific purposes, chief among which are to pay debts, public and private, to facilitate exchanges, and to buy the obligations of others. If money has not the function to pay debts, public and private, it is as valueless as money as any other commodity. Take from money, of whatever material made, the power to pay debts, public and private, and its chief money function is destroyed, and the material simply becomes a commodity, to be bought and sold in the market the same as other commodities.

Each nation at the present time fixes the rate at which gold can be coined into money free of charge. In the United States 25.8 grains of standard gold are required to be put into every dollar coined out of that metal. The price of gold bullion, therefore, in the United States is fixed by law, the same as it is in every other country where it can be coined free into money. Can it be doubted that if all the nations should close their mints to the free coinage of gold, the price of gold bullion would fall in the market? Can there be any doubt that the price would fall more than 50 per cent? Everybody knows now what the price of gold bullion is, because it is fixed by law and by nothing else. However much gold may be produced, the price of it in the United States under the present law will be the same as it is now, viz, 25.8 grains will be worth a dollar.

At the present time silver bullion is selling for about 57 cents an ounce. This is so because silver bullion is priced in the same way that corn and wheat and other commodities are priced.

If the mints of the United States should be opened to the free coinage of silver at the rate established by the law of 1837, can anyone doubt for a moment that silver bullion would be worth $1.29 an ounce? Is there a man in this Chamber who, if he were the owner of silver bullion, would sell it for less than the mint price? Is there any person anywhere on the globe who would sell silver bullion for less than the mint price established by the law in the United States, less exchange, insurance, and transportation? I do not think any such person could be found. The mint price, therefore, would be the market price of the silver bullion in the United States, and that would fix the price of bullion throughout the world.

Any person who has given the matter a moment's thought would say that the price of silver bullion could not be less than that fixed by law. If gold were treated by the nations in the same way that silver is now treated, it would not be worth as much in the market as silver is to-day, and if neither could be used for money, they would be practically valueless. A man who is the owner of a ton of gold bullion in the United States can determine very readily its value, and that is done by dividing the total mass of metal by the amount of metal that is required to be put into each unit and the quotient will be the price of it expressed in dollars. The same would be true of silver under free coinage of that metal. To say that it would not be true is to contradict the facts in the case and the universal judgment of men. The price, however, of either gold or silver has nothing to do with the purchasing power of the money made out of those metals. As soon as money is coined and put into circulation it takes upon itself a new relation; the question then is, What is its value or purchasing power? The value or purchasing power of every unit of money that is in circulation must depend, other things remaining the same, upon the number of units that are in the market to be sold—that are in circulation.

The real contention in the money question never was and never can be over the material out of which money shall be made, but over the quantity of it that shall be made and put into circulation. Those who contend that gold alone should be used for money are contending for a smaller volume of money than those who contend for the free coinage of money out of both metals.

But no one will claim that with both gold and silver used fully for money the mines will each year produce enough of those metals to increase the volume of money each year with the increasing population. The volume of money would still depend upon chance. There should be no chance about it. The volume of money should be increased scientifically and with mathematical certainty. When the Government has so much money to raise we figure to a nicety just how much taxes to levy to raise the money required. In the same way we should figure to a nicety just how much new money should be manufactured each year and put into circulation. When the people increase, just so should money increase. The people can not "make bricks without straw." This is why I have provided for the coinage of paper money, every dollar of which will pay all debts, public and private, as well as a gold dollar.

The bill that is before the Senate for consideration is one designed for the express purpose of decreasing the number of units in circulation that have the power to pay debts, public and private.

Mr. President, as long as you give to corporations or private individuals the power to control the money volume, just so long the business and industries of the country will have to respond to their demands, and it is for the purpose of breaking up this combination, the most dangerous and powerful combination that any country or people could be subject to, and to take out of their hands the power to control the volume of money is the purpose of this substitute, and it would do it.

The first thing Congress should do is to establish a unit of account, and this was practically done in the act of 1792. My bill has the same provision. The next duty of Congress is to manufacture units, and under the Constitution, as already stated, units may be made out of any material that the Congress may determine upon. That this is so will be doubted by no one who has examined the matter or knows anything about it.

Much is said about a unit of value, and the statute as it now stands provides that the unit of value shall be dollar and the same shall be made out of gold, each dollar to contain 25.8 grains of standard gold. To say that a dollar is a standard of value is to state a proposition that is senseless, for there can in the very nature of things be no standard of value. Why? Because value has neither length, breadth, nor thickness, and is not ponderable. Then what is value? Value is simply the judgment or estimation of individuals in respect to a certain thing. The value of a dollar or of any other piece of money, like anything else that is offered for sale, is determined by the parties to each transaction in which a dollar or money is involved. Value, therefore, is estimation judgment, and in economics can have relation to nothing except money. Other things are priced in terms of money.

Money is a commodity manufactured by law to be used for certain purposes, and the value of it must of necessity, like everything else, depend upon the demand of and supply for it. The law of supply and demand is as applicable to money as to any other thing, and to say that it is not is to state a thing that is absolutely false, as every sane person must know. If the supply of money be increased and the demand for it remains the same, its value or purchasing power must decrease; so if the demand for money remain the same and the quantity of it be decreased, the value or purchasing power of it must go up. The rise and fall in the value or purchasing power of money is evidenced by the rise and fall in the prices of things that are in the market for sale. Prices generally can not go up and the value or purchasing power of money remain the same. Neither can the prices of things go down in general and the purchasing power of money remain the same.

The relation that money sustains to things, to prices, is a mathematical one, pure and simple. Every person who is familiar with the rules in common or vulgar fractions can very readily ascertain how the value or purchasing power of money is affected.

If the population of a country should double and the money volume remain the same, of necessity the purchasing power of every unit of money in circulation would be doubled. If, on the other hand, the population of a country should be decreased one-half, the money volume remaining the same, the purchasing power of each unit in circulation would fall 50 per cent, other things remaining the same.

Money is only valuable as such because of the functions which it performs.

The gold that is in a piece of money in ordinary transactions is not bought or sold because of the metal, but simply and solely because of the functions which the Government, by law, had conferred upon it. Take from a twenty-dollar gold piece the stamp that is placed thereon, obliterate all evidence of its coinage, and it becomes valueless as money, and can only be bought and sold like other commodities, except that the price of it is determined by the mint rate. This would be true also of silver dollars under free coinage of that metal.

If you melt a twenty-dollar gold piece into a nugget the money functions of that piece would be destroyed. The price of the gold bullion that is in the nugget would not be affected, and why? Because you could send that nugget to the mint and have it coined into a twenty-dollar gold piece, and when so coined it is clothed again with all the functions of money. With the nugget no person could pay any debt whatever any more than he could pay a debt with wheat, corn, or any other commodity. In other words, as soon as the piece is destroyed as money it becomes a commodity, the price of which is fixed by law. The law gives the right to every person to take gold to the mint to be coined into money free of charge.

How is it in the case of 20 silver dollars? In the market 20 silver dollars will buy as much property, pay for as much services, discharge as much debt, in the United States as a twenty-dollar gold piece. Of this there can be no doubt whatever, because every silver dollar, under the laws as they now exist, has the power to pay all debts, public and private. If 20 silver dollars were melted into a nugget the money functions of those dollars would be destroyed absolutely, and the nugget could no more pay a debt, either public or private, than the nugget of gold made out of a twenty-dollar gold piece. As soon as the silver dollars are destroyed as money the silver becomes a commodity, and is bought and sold in the market the same as other things.

If every person had the right to take silver to the mint and have it coined into dollars or units, free of charge, would not the nugget made out of 20 silver dollars be worth $20 in the United States? Can there be any doubt about this proposition? If the person who owned the silver nugget could take it to the mint and have it coined into 20 silver dollars, free of charge, would not the market price of that nugget be 20 silver dollars? Who says that this would not be true? Would not the mint rate be the market rate, and would not the market rate be the mint rate? There can be no question about it. It is a self-evident proposition.

But it is said that if we should open our mints to the free coinage of silver it would have no effect upon the price of silver outside of the borders of the United States. Is there any person who believes such a proposition as that who has any knowledge of the subject at all? I doubt it very much. If this law should be passed, in the United States, at least, silver would be worth $1.29 an ounce. Of this there can be no question, because no person in the United States could be found, whether miner, banker, broker, or Senator, who is the owner of silver bullion, who would sell it for less than the mint rate, any more than a person would now sell gold bullion for less than the mint rate. How would it be with the person who lived in England, for example? Suppose a man living in London had a ton of silver bullion. Would he dispose of his bullion after the passage of this law for less than the price that he could get for it in the American market? I doubt if any man on earth could be found who would be willing to dispose of his silver bullion for a less sum than the market price of it in the United States. What would be its market price here? Manifestly the mint rate. Would it sell for any less? Surely no man would dispose of his bullion for less money than he could have it coined into.

Does any man sell gold bullion for less than the amount he can receive for it at the mint?

Under free coinage of gold or silver the price of bullion is fixed by law, and there is no instance where any person has ever sold any quantity of either gold or silver in any country for a less amount than he could have his metal coined into, free of charge, at the mints of such country.

It is said, Mr. President, and it is true, that silver is worth in the market now less than it was previous to 1873. Why is it less in price? Because nowhere on earth, except possibly in Mexico, can it be coined free into money at any rate whatever. It therefore is treated as a commodity, and the price of it everywhere is determined by the inexorable law of supply and demand.

In the case of gold the supply is limited, the demand for money made out of it is unlimited, and the rate at which it can be coined into money is fixed by law. Hence it is that the mint price and the market price of gold bullion everywhere are the same. This would be true of silver if that metal could be coined free into money.

It is contended that if we should admit silver at the mints to be coined free into money the money so coined would not circulate in other countries. If it did not, it would be a great blessing to the American people.

It is assumed by many that American gold coins do circulate throughout the world and perform the functions of money. This is not true, as everybody must know who has ever traveled abroad.

A twenty-dollar gold piece has no more power to pay a debt, public or private, in any other country than the United States than the gold coins of any other country have the power to pay debts, public or private, within the United States. No person in England, for example, to whom American gold coin is tendered in payment of debt is under any obligation whatever to take it. If he should take it, it would be an act of accommodation merely to the party tendering it. The party who receives it would at once estimate its value in what? In English money, and give him credit on his account for the amount of money that his gold coin would coin into in Great Britain, just as if he tendered so much gold bullion or so many pig-iron bars or so many bales of cotton, and that had been estimated in English money and entered on the books to his credit. Simply that, and nothing more. That is what you call international money. You might as well speak of international cotton.

The rate at which gold can be coined into money in different nations depends upon the law of each nation, and in determining the price of gold bullion in any country, whether coined or uncoined, it must be ascertained how much money the bullion would coin into in the country where it is sold. That is the calculation, and nothing else.

Nobody will pretend to say that in the United States English gold coins circulate and perform the functions of money. In determining the price of English coins in the United States, reference is had to the coinage rate here and not in England.

It is not true that gold coins of the United States circulate and perform the functions of money without the borders of the United States, and if silver could be coined free into money here silver dollars would not circulate and perform the functions of money outside of the United States. This is so because money is purely and absolutely domestic in its character. It is for use in the country in which it is made. It never was intended to circulate outside of that country, and it is a curse to the country when it does so even as bullion, as long as it is used as a money metal.

It is said that if silver should be coined into money here the country would be flooded. That is another great objection. One was that it would not circulate in foreign countries, and the other is that we would be inundated with a flood of silver money. To admit that is to admit the whole contention of those who favor an increase in the money volume. If there is anybody in this Chamber or out of it, in the United States, who would fear such a flood let him speak.

The man who brings foreign silver to our mints to have it coined free into money will stay here with it if he can not take it away to other countries where it is equally as valuable. If he stays here with it he must use it. He will put it into industrial enterprises and employ labor and add to the material wealth of the nation. Would that be a curse? Is that the kind of a flood that our gold-standard friends are afraid of? But, Mr. President, there is no use in discussing this or any other trumped-up scare. There is no sense or reason in it. Besides, it is the duty of Congress to regulate the volume of money. Let Congress do that duty and then there is an end of the whole matter. Let Congress determine just how much money we need and then make it. If Congress can not be trusted to do this, who can? Is it better to leave it to chance? Is it better to put it into the hands of a few bankers? How foolish and absurd. Of course, Mr. President, there can be too much money, as well as too little, as I have already stated, but whenever and wherever there has been too much money there have been a thousand times and places where there was too little money.

Both are evils; but to-day we are threatened with the evil of contraction; we are not threatened with the evil of inflation. The trouble with this country to-day is that it is short on money. The Republicans in this Congress and the officials of the Government have admitted that in the bill we have now before us. This Senate bill providing for the gold standard and providing that the banks shall have unlimited power to circulate their notes is a confession that this country is short on money. Every banker in the United States says we are short on money, and the very bill that is now here under consideration emphasizes that more strongly than anything else.

Mr. President, we are short on money, and we are so short that we could absorb all the surplus money in the world to-day and not have enough to meet the demands of our population and our business. Who would be injured if some of the surplus silver that can be found in the world to-day was to come here and be coined into money? It is certain that the great mass of the people, those who produce and distribute the wealth of the nation, would be greatly benefited by an increase. Then who would be injured? The usurers, the exploiters of wealth, the idle rich, and those whose salaries are fixed by law think they would be injured, but they would not be. It is true that their profits would not be so large, but they, too, would prosper, because the property they have would increase in price and their opportunities, if they desired to avail themselves of them, would increase also. So the very men who are claiming that they would be injured, though small in number, if they understood the situation, would find that in the long run they would prosper with the remainder of the people.

Mr. President, it is said also that the credit of the nation will be injured if this gold-standard bank-monopoly bill is not passed. What is the matter with the nation's credit now? The majority claim that they want this bill to strengthen the credit of the nation. Strengthen it! I stand up to defend this nation, and to say that it does not need any strengthening of its credit, and that if it does, it does not need to be put in debt to strengthen that credit. I can not strengthen my credit by putting bonds and mortgages on myself to pay future interest, and you can not convince me or any 10-year old boy in America that you can strengthen the credit of this nation in that manner. There are some people who seem to think that the affairs of a nation have to be conducted entirely different from the affairs of a prudent and successful business man.

Can anybody tell me why a nation that has the sole and absolute power to manufacture money to be used in its own borders as a medium of exchange should ever go into the market to borrow of others money to pay its expenses? Is there an individual in this body, or in this country who would borrow a single dollar of any person if he had the power and ability to manufacture his own money? If an individual would not do such a thing, can anybody give me a good reason why a nation should do so? Why can not a government use common sense, like any sane individual?

Does the miller's wife go without bread and borrow it of her neighbors while her husband has plenty of flour in his mill, or wheat to be converted into flour and the power and facilities for grinding it? If she should go about borrowing loaves of bread and agreeing to pay usury upon it, would not every person in the community where she lives regard her as a fit subject for the asylum? What difference is there between the miller's wife and a government in the case cited? There is no difference.

It is more absurd and foolish for a government—a great, rich, strong government like this—to go about borrowing money and creating a perpetual national debt than it would be for a miller's wife to go about borrowing loaves of bread and paying usury upon them while her larder was full of meal. Instead of creating a larger national debt we ought to pay off as soon as possible the debt we now have, and then stop borrowing. We are amply able to pay every dollar the Government owes, yet this Senate bill provides that the debt shall be increased and made perpetual—pay interest forever. Indeed, this bill makes it necessary to increase the debt each year in order to get any increase in the money of the country—a cunningly devised scheme for the bankers and bondholders.

Mr. President, the next contention of the Goldites is that if silver or paper should be coined into money it would drive gold out of the country. Suppose it would. What has that got to do with the situation? Gold never will stay with us except when it could rob us; it never stays except in times of peace; it always deserts in times of war. It does not even ask permission to go when war breaks out or trouble comes. It simply stays so long as it pleases it, and it profits by it.

Mr. President, I think we could survive and prosper as a nation if all the gold left; we could survive and prosper if all the silver left us, for it is as great a coward and traitor in times of war as gold, provided our silver friends would not be as cranky as our gold friends and insist, whenever we got short on silver, that we must starve to death because there is not enough silver to make money. Suppose both gold and silver should desert us in times of great need. What would we do? Do just as we have done in the past when both deserted us, coin greenbacks, or coin money out of diamonds or platinum, if our silver friends should get so fastidious about the substance as the gold men are about gold. The Government has unlimited power to make its money out of any substance—make a scientific money and manufacture each year just enough new money to meet the demands of increasing population and business without any accident or chance. When gold and silver desert us, this is just what we do and must do. Then why not make that kind of money for all the time? This kind of money which serves us in times of war will certainly serve us in times of peace. Then our money would always be with us.

Is it not true that this country did business for more than thirteen years without a gold or a silver dollar in it, so far as anyone could see? That period included one of the greatest wars that this world has ever seen. Was there any trouble in the business affairs of the country from 1862 to 1875 in consequence of there being no metal money? There was none whatever. The trouble that arose during the latter part of that period was the result of the destruction of the notes that the Government had issued and put into circulation, and which were performing the functions of money, and not because there was a lack of gold and silver money.

Let the gold go abroad if it will. All money that is made of metal will go to the country where the owner of it can get the most for it, and if a man can sell gold to better advantage in England than he can in this country he will take it there. The same is true of silver. It is a matter of little importance what material is used by a government to manufacture money out of, and therefore it is of no importance whether gold remains in circulation or does not. Gold will not go abroad because it is the dearer metal, but because the need for gold for monetary purposes is greater elsewhere than here, and that need would be evidenced by lower prices in the country to which it was taken. As long as money is made out of gold or silver or gold alone or silver alone each nation can only get its distributive share of the total amount. If one nation has at any period more than its distributive share, the surplus will be forced to other countries which have not their distributive share. If silver could be coined free here, undoubtedly prices would go up, and as a result gold, to some extent at least, would be taken out of the country to restore the monetary equilibrium. That would be beneficial to the country to which it was sent, for it would increase the quantity of money there, and that would have a tendency to increase general prices.

Since money is domestic in its character it should be made out of a material that can not be exported or imported on account of the material, and as long as the present monetary conditions exist there will be constant disturbances in the business world.

It is said that the value of money depends upon the material of which it is made. But that that is not true must be apparent to anybody who knows anything about the money question. Except for export and import, money is never bought or sold because of the material. Gold coins are never bought or sold on the market for the metal that is in the coins, except for the purpose of exporting them abroad, where they will be sold by weight, like cotton or other commodities.

What use is the metal in a twenty-dollar gold piece as money? Does the merchant when he sells goods for such a piece buy it because he wants the metal? No. He never thinks of the metal;

he has no use for the metal. It is not the metal that he desires. What is it that he buys? He simply buys the functions which the law has clothed the coin with. It could have been placed upon anything else just as well. Take the functions of money from the piece of metal and it is valueless to him as money.

What is the metal used for? Simply and solely for the purpose of bearing the stamp of the Government, which certifies that it has the power to perform certain functions and that it was made in pursuance of law. The metal is fit for nothing except to inform the holder that it is made in pursuance of law and that the law has said that it shall perform certain functions.

No person who buys a twenty-dollar gold piece ever thinks of the metal that is in it. All he has in mind is the fact that he can use it to purchase other things with or to pay his debts. What is true with respect to money made out of gold is true with respect to money made out of any material. The stamp of Government may be placed upon a piece of paper and clothe that piece of paper with the same functions that it can clothe metal money with. If not, why not?

Mr. President, the making of money out of gold and silver is a relic of barbarism. Surely the time will come in our civilization when we will discard that one last relic. If the gold mines were to shut down and the silver mines should stop giving out any metal at all, would that break the hallucination; would it open and put to work the minds of the fossils; would it put everybody to using common sense about money as they do about everything else? If we could get rid of all such barbaric doubts and heresies it would be a blessing to mankind.

It is claimed that if silver could be coined free the silver-mine owners would be benefited. That was one of the great slogans of the last campaign. I do not deny that charge; I frankly admit it: and in reply to it I say, why not benefit the silver-mine owner? Is not a silver-mine owner as much entitled to protection and consideration as the gold-mine owner? Do we not benefit the gold-mine owner by having the mints open to gold? Yes. Then as long as the gold-mine owner is thus protected I am in favor of giving exactly the same benefit to the silver-mine owner. Are not the silver-mine owners of as much importance as the gold-mine owners? Are they not just as good citizens? At the present you furnish every gold miner in the world a market for his metal and you say to him bring it here and we will coin it into units of money for you, free of charge. He knows when he mines his gold just what he can get for it. He does not have to consult the market reports. He knows that the law says that his bullion in the United States is worth a certain sum per ounce.

Why should the gold-mine owner be protected and furnished a market for his metal at a fixed price, a market that is always open, where the demand is constant, a market where he never is at a loss to know what he shall do with his metal or what it will bring? Is this Government to grant to a certain class of individuals, who produce a certain commodity, a market that is constant, where the price of his commodity is fixed by law, to the exclusion of every other person in the country from that privilege? Our forefathers declared against monopolies, but a gold monopoly is the most gigantic trust that Congress could create. Oh, but it will be said that silver has been discarded by the nations as money, and the price of it has gone down, and therefore it is not as valuable as gold. Such statements emanate from the bondholders, the money scavengers, and their agents, and from no person who has an understanding of the money question. It is they who dictate that money shall be made out of gold alone and not out of the two metals or anything else.

If money shall be made out of the two metals, they know that the quantity would be increased; and that is what they object to; they know that prices in general would rise, and that is what they object to; they know the purchasing power of the gold dollar, which has already been doubled in purchasing power by legislation, would fall to its normal and honest price, and that is what they object to. What they desire is to have the purchasing power of money, no matter what it is made out of, increased and kept increasing, except when they desire to make fluctuations by calling in or putting out bank notes. They know, if the money volume should be increased, that prices would rise, that the price of labor would be increased, the products of the people would be greater in number, and there would be general prosperity for every man who toils or who creates wealth or who is engaged in an honest productive enterprise. They have no interest whatever in the wealth producers of the country except so far as they may be able, through their usury and exactions, to filch from them their earnings.

If money shall be made out of metal, then make it out of the two metals and coin each free, and place the gold miner and silver miner upon the same basis with respect to the law.

But many people are afraid that if such a thing should be done our country would be flooded with money.

Why is it that these good, gold-standard friends of ours never suggest the possibility of a scarcity of money? Does it not seem that it would occur to them that if there could be such a thing as a flood of money it is equally possible, under certain conditions, that there might be a scarcity of money? Yet I have never heard a single advocate of the gold standard suggest that there might possibly, under some circumstances, be a scarcity of full, legal-tender money.

Mr. President, in the name of all the people, in the name of humanity, in the name of the struggling millions in this country, I invite this increase of money that would come from opening the mints to silver. I am certain that I myself and that all the people would be carried away with ecstasies if they could be drowned in a flood of money. It is the flood that the bondholder, the gambler, and the usurer fear; for when that comes and general prosperity reigns among the wealth producers, his business will cease to be so lavishly prosperous, and the many will have something of an opportunity to get on in the world without first calling at the usurer's office to give him that which he never earned.

But it is said that other nations have discarded silver. What difference does that make to us? Shall we not be permitted to manufacture our own money and in such quantities as we desire because other nations, controlled as they are by the money sharks, have dictated a different policy as to a domestic matter? Do we ask Great Britain, for example, what laws we shall pass here with respect to crimes, the descent and distribution of the estate, the incorporation of companies, the management of our cities and our various institutions? We totally disregard Great Britain in respect to those matters, as we do every other nation. Why shall we not with respect to money? Are not the interests of our people of vastly more importance to us than the interests of the people of other nations? It seems to me so. There are many who seem to think that when the question of money is under consideration we must get on our knees and consult other nations to find out what they will permit us to do.

The functions of money can be stamped by our Government upon any material the Congress may determine. What is the best material? That paper is the best material on which to stamp money functions nobody of intelligence will dispute. Why? Because it is more difficult to be counterfeited, it wears just as long, it is more convenient to handle, and is easier to transport; it costs less to produce and less to manufacture.

There is another important consideration, and that is, it costs less for the Government to buy the paper on which to stamp the function than it does to buy gold or silver. Why should the Government spend a dollar on silver and lose the interest on its value to have it go about to declare the functions of $1, when a piece of paper is more durable, more convenient, more desirable to the people, and better in every way than the piece of silver? It is a waste of raw material. I would rather have the silver in spoons and the gold in my teeth and have my money in paper; then I would have both.

Mr. President, these are my views on the question, and I may say they are the views of every man who has studied the question scientifically. While I claim no credit for originality, I have studied carefully the works and the expressions of those who have mastered the subject, and I am satisfied that they are right. Yet my amendment does not propose to make all of the money out of paper. My amendment provides for the free coinage of gold, the free coinage of silver, and then for the free coinage of greenbacks up to how much? What quantity? Supplement the gold and silver with the free coinage of greenbacks each year just enough to keep pace with the increase of population and business. Is not that right?

Can not you trust Congress to do it? You trust the Congress to lay taxes and collect them. If Congress has enough sense to say how much taxes shall be put upon the people, has it not sense enough and honesty to say how much money shall be added to the money each year; and if it has not sense enough, in heaven's name, do you think a selfish banker, who is looking after his self-interest and not anybody else's, has? My bill provides for the coinage of gold, silver, and paper. I put in the gold and silver because under the present conditions it seemed to me better to do it. It seems to me easier in that way to reach relief and a just monetary system, because then we have less prejudice to combat, and because we accomplish the same thing, except that we waste the raw material in the dollar, which is unnecessary; but we can stand that loss if we can get a sufficient volume of money.

If any people or any nation should find that there is one kind of money that does very well in times of peace but that will not do in times of war, while there is another kind of money that is always reliable in times of war, which one of these two kinds of money would it be wise for that people or nation to adopt in arranging a sound, safe, and reliable financial system? The kind that will answer well both in peace and in war or the kind that leaves us when war and trouble come? Following the old and true adage, In times of peace prepare for war, would not everyone with a thimbleful of brains at once reply, Let us by all means adopt the money that will stand by us and do service in times of peril? I challenge any Senator on this floor to deny or to question the correctness of this statement. Now, if this is true, what does it teach us about the kind of money we should now adopt in times of peace in order to be ready for war as well as for peace? What kind of money did the Government use from 1861, the beginning of the civil war, until long after the war closed?

What kind of money did Abraham Lincoln call to his assistance, not only to run the ordinary expenses of the Government but to supply the enormous and expensive munitions of war? Was it gold? No. Why was it not gold? Because gold, the thieving coward that it is, was the nation's first deserter. It did not wait even for the first gun to be fired, but with the first serious rumor of war it took itself in hiding. In times of peace gold smilingly turns up and asks for the permission of being our money standard, because it desires the privilege of making every dollar in the nation pay tribute to itself as long as there is peace and no danger. When war or trouble comes, it asks to be excused and deserts us to our fate. Yes; gold deserted Lincoln, so did silver. What kind of money stayed with us and fought the battles of the nation? What kind of money was used throughout that powerful conflict until the last gun was fired at Appomattox? It was the good old reliable greenback, that the money shark would strike down to-day. The greenback was a patriot and has been the friend of the people. Gold has been a coward, and a traitor and a robber. The substitute which I have offered is to make the patriotic and faithful greenback the mainstay of the country in peace as it must be and will be in war. Is there any question about which one of these two moneys the people would choose?

If the nation can support itself with greenbacks in time of war, who dare tell me that we are not strong enough to do it in time of peace and plenty and prosperity? If our credit is good in time of war and good enough to support greenbacks then, is it not a thousand times stronger in times of peace? Therefore let us take the money that is good both in peace and war.

The different pieces of money provided in my amendment are designated dollars or units, or dollar or unit, as the case may be. This is the only proper thing, and the statutes that have been enacted heretofore have disregarded accurate and scientific terms with respect to money. The only thing that we can do is to establish a unit of account and then determine what units shall be made of and then proceed to manufacture dollars or units. The dollar is the name of the unit of account, and all accounts are required to be kept in dollars and fractional parts thereof, the same as now. No denomination shall be greater than twenty dollars or units. The reason for this is that money is made for the plain people of the country and not for the banking interests. Money is made to be used and not to be hoarded, and it is more convenient that all the pieces should be small rather than large. The gold coins are at present no larger than $20, therefore it is that $20 seems to be the proper number of dollars that should be put into one piece.

Under this amendment, if it should be enacted into law, the present debt of the United States would be paid and discharged within at least five years from the date of its passage.

It will be observed that as fast as each note of the United States or of the banks shall come into the hands of the Government it shall be taken up and destroyed and in its place substituted coined paper money. Within a very short time the great mass of the notes now outstanding would disappear from circulation and the new money would appear in its place. This of itself would cause no disturbance, and the debt of the United States would be decreased to that extent. It will be asked, "How is it possible to coin money out of paper?" To coin means to fashion, to manufacture, to stamp. It is true that the verb itself is commonly understood to mean to stamp metal or to fashion metal into money.

As a matter of fact the Congress manufactures money; it manufactures it out of gold and out of silver. Why can it not manufacture it out of any other material? It certainly can. The Government alone owns the factories in which money is manufactured, and it certainly can own a factory in which money can be manufactured out of paper. The paper money that is in circulation now in the United States is composed entirely of the promissory notes of the Government. These notes ultimately must be paid, and whenever they come into the hands of the Government they can surely be destroyed and the obligation canceled. In order to prevent any financial distress money coined out of paper can be substituted therefor and the people benefited to the extent of the discharge of a portion, at least, of their debts. The policy seems to be, however, of those who manage and control the finances of the country, to prevent the payment of the debts of the Government, and no person yet has suggested, so far as I know, any remedy by which the notes of the Government shall be paid and the debt evidenced by them discharged.

But the advocates of this bill say, We propose to give you bank currency if we do not give you greenbacks. Mr. President, if the gold standard is right, why do we need anything besides gold for money? The only way to prove that the gold standard is honest is to show that we have enough gold to make a sufficient number of legal-tender dollars. If there is not enough gold to be gotten to make sufficient money for the people, then it is a crime to make gold the standard of value and require all debts to be paid in gold, and that is what this Senate bill does.

If there were enough gold in sight now, who could guarantee that there would be a year from now or five years from now? It is an uncertain quantity; it is controlled by accidents and chances; but the fact is there is not enough gold now in sight, and there has not been and there is no probability that there will be, and this bill admits it. Why? Because it provides for the bankers flooding the country with their promissory notes and allowing them to draw interest on them. You admit that it is necessary to supplement gold. If this is true and we must issue such bogus money that must be redeemed in some other money, tell me how it makes it better to have a bank to issue it than to have the Government to issue it? Is one man in the country greater than seventy millions?

Does it make the dollar better for the banker to handle it and lend it out on interest? It makes the dollar no better, it makes the people no better, but poorer, and it makes the banker richer; and that is all there is in it. Is one bank stronger and more reliable and more honest than all the rest of the country? Are the 4,000 banks to which you give this privilege stronger and more reliable than all the rest of the country—than the Government itself? Is their credit better than the Government's credit? If so, then there is some reason and justice in this bill. Oh, what miserable hypocrisy! If we must have token money to be redeemed in some other money, then, in the name of high heaven, if we want the best token money that can be made, why not let the Government make it all?

Mr. President, the only explanation and the only excuse is that then the big profits that the bankers make would be saved to the people and the bankers would not make it, but the people would keep it in their pockets. That is the only difference between the plan proposed in this bill and the plan I propose. Yes, there is one other difference, and that is if the Government issued its money, then the bankers would not be able to contract and expand its volume when they wanted to speculate and make prices go up and down as it suited their greed or gambling desires and schemes. Inasmuch as everybody admits that the most important thing about money is its volume, is it not the most foolish, not to say criminal, thing that a government ever did to allow a part of their number—a minority of their number; 1 man out of 70,000,000 or 100 men out of 70,000,000—to say how much money you shall have and how much money you shall not have? Would not any seventy millions of people be fools and arrant fools to put a rope around their necks and give the other end of the rope to a few hundred men who wanted to make the others pay tribute to them? Yet that is what this bill does. It allows a few to say to 70,000,000 how large a volume of money they shall have and how little without consulting Congress.

I am not consulted, you, Mr. President, will not be consulted, when your bill is passed. You will not stand in your seat responsible to your constituents and say how much money there shall be next year or the year thereafter. But the whole thing will be decided and controlled off in the countingrooms without consulting us. We are a side show. The headquarters will be in Wall street. It does something else even worse than that. When this bill is once enacted into law, it makes it impossible as long as this law stands for the amount of money to be increased even by the banks except by an increase of the national debt. You propose to put me in the position that hereafter, when I object to increasing the national debt, you can say to me, "Then you object to increasing the amount of money."

Once this bill is passed into law, and neither I nor any other representative of the people on this floor or in the other House could protest against a further increase of the national debt without having it thrown in his teeth by the Goldites that when we protested against that we protested against the only means possible by which the bankers could, if they saw fit, increase the circulating medium and give the people more money when they needed it. Monstrous proposition! Shocking scheme! And yet that is what this bill does. But, Mr. President, under my amendment, instead of increasing the national debt and making it necessary to increase it before you can increase the circulating medium, my amendment provides that the national debt shall be discharged, and very rapidly. The money to be coined under it will be no more of a debt than the money coined out of gold or silver, and as long as the Government endures just so long will that money be as valuable as money made out of gold or silver. It will be said at once that this bill will disturb the parity between the dollars manufactured under it. Whoever knew that the parity between two dollars, each of which had the same power to pay debts as the other, could possibly be disturbed as long as they remain money? Parity is a fraud, and people only talk about it who do not understand the money question in the slightest; or if they do, they talk of it for the purpose of misleading the unwary and the ignorant.

Can there be any difference in the purchasing power of a dollar made out of paper and one made out of gold when each under the law has the same power to discharge a debt, public and private, that the other has? Nobody has ever heard of such an instance.

I challenge any Goldite on this floor or in this country to point to an instance in the world where one dollar has ever failed to be at a parity with any other dollar if they both stood on the same footing before the law, clothed with the same legal-tender functions and neither one discriminated against, no matter what substance they are made of. There has been a great deal of experiment in money in this world, but in all the experiments history does not furnish the illustration to disprove the truth of my statement.

Mr. President, can there be any difference in the purchasing power of a dollar made out of paper, or silver, or gold, if they both under the law have precisely the same functions and power? Congress has unlimited power to put those functions on anything it sees fit.

It has been stated on this floor and elsewhere over and over again that what we want in this country is money every dollar of which is equal in purchasing power to every other dollar. That is all I contend for; that is all the people of this country want; and the only way to do that is to clothe each dollar with the absolute power to discharge any and all public and private debts. In other words, each dollar shall be a legal tender for all debts, public and private.

A dollar that must be redeemed in some other dollar is not a dollar, no matter what substance the Government uses in stamping the dollar upon. Every dollar must be a dollar by itself—a full legal tender by itself—and not be dependent upon any other dollar. In short, every tub must stand on its own bottom. That is the kind of honest money that a government should give to its people.

If a man can pay as much debt with a dollar coined out of paper at the taxing office as he can with a gold or silver dollar, then that paper dollar is as valuable as either of the others and the parity between the three or any two of them would be maintained.

Outside of what is called the Treasury notes, and possibly coin certificates, not a single solitary note issued by the Government on its own account or through the banks has any power whatever to pay debts, public or private. And yet by common consent of the people, for they practically have no other kind of money, these notes are received and passed from hand to hand and perform the functions of money. No lawyer, however, would ever think of advising his client, when required to make a legal tender for a debt, to tender national-bank notes or any of the other notes issued by the Government except such as is made by specific statute a legal tender for debts, public and private.

Nobody need be disturbed about the parity business; that is too senseless to be talked about, and when I hear Senators and others talk about disturbing the parity of our money or maintaining the parity of it I know that they are either interested in banks or are under obligation to banks or sustain such relation to them as to practically be their attorneys. In other words, I suspect that for one consideration or another they are doing the work of the money scavenger.

All money that is made in a country should remain in the country to perform the work designed for it to perform. If it goes out for any reason to remain out, it is valueless as money in the country where it is made as soon as it leaves its borders, and it ceases to be money. Money made out of paper will not be exported as such, but will remain in the country where it is made. That money is good money and no other is good money, except so long as it remains to do the work for which it was created.

Under my amendment all the silver that is in the vaults of the Government will not only be coined into money, but that that is coined will be paid out as required and the certificates that are outstanding against it will be discharged and paid, and the bullion and coin will be released. This will be true also of gold. If a person should bring either gold or silver to the mints to be coined into money and should prefer money coined out of paper to the metal, whose business is it but his? And surely as long as people take in exchange for their bullion money coined out of paper the parity between the paper and metal money will be maintained.

That we are short in this country on money nobody will doubt. As stated before, the bill under consideration here reported to this Senate is conclusive proof of that fact. If there were plenty of gold and silver money in circulation in the United States, in the name of reason why is it that the banks should be permitted to issue notes, indorsed by the Government, to be used as a circulating medium? Why extend to the banking interests of this country such a privilege as this? Are the banks any better than individuals? Should they have any greater rights before the law than individuals? If we extend to a bank the right to issue notes made by the Government to be used as money, why not give the same right to individuals? We should not; and every man who has the interest of the people at heart should not only protest against this bill but vote against it and all other bills of similar import.

It is said that this bill under consideration is gotten up for the express purpose of furnishing an elastic currency and placing the country upon an absolute gold basis. An elastic currency! In the name of all the gods, is not our currency elastic enough now? It is so elastic that outside of the banks and the officeholders few are able to see it, much less to be owners of it. This Government has no right whatever to create corporations and give them the power to control the currency of the country, expand it when they see fit, and contract it when they see fit—elasticity to the banker only, with the power to pull the elastic. The duty of this Government is to manufacture money for the people and place it in their hands and let them do with it what they see fit, and when it fails to do this, then the Government absolutely fails to perform one of the greatest functions of government, one of the greatest reasons for organizing government.

Mr. President, it is not a question of elasticity, it is a question of quantity. If the quantity be increased, as it will be under my amendment, not only the debts of the Government will be discharged, but the people would have an opportunity to pay what they owe during their natural lives.

Since 1873 the debts of the people of the country, municipal, State, corporate, and individual have increased annually, so that to-day the people in the aggregate owe more than forty thousand millions of dollars. When will this enormous debt be paid? Time never will be, under present financial conditions, when this debt will be paid. Individual debts will be outlawed to be sure, as well as many corporate debts, but others will take their places, so that instead of the debt decreasing it will increase.

The national banks alone in this country, on September 20, 1898, owed more than four thousand millions of dollars with an equal amount of resources. Of the resources, about three hundred millions of dollars was money. In the case of the banks alone there is a total debt of more than eight thousand millions of dollars, all of which is based upon less than three hundred millions of dollars, of which a little over one hundred and ten millions was composed of legal-tender notes which are themselves debts. What a business this is. Call this business? I call this worse than any bunco-steering game that was ever invented. Under the authority of law the people who own these banks have been able to build up a credit business of more than eight thousand millions of dollars upon less than two hundred millions of actual money.

The amount of interest that the 3,585 national banks that were then in existence extracted from its victims is not stated by the Comptroller of the Currency, and it seems to me for very obvious reasons. He reports that that year there were 9,485 banks of all kinds in the United States, with total resources of something over eight thousand six hundred millions of dollars, with an equal amount of liabilities; that the total amount of money in all those banks on the 14th day of July, 1898, was $687,796,173. Of that amount $84,598,284 is listed as cash. The probabilities are that that was made up largely of clearing-house receipts and stuff of that sort.

Here, then, is a total debt on the part of those banks, independent of their money, of about sixteen thousand millions of dollars. What a commentary on the financial policy of a government like this that permits a few thousand people to organize banks, put in a little money, and increase the indebtedness of the country in this great amount. Was there ever a greater fraud perpetrated under the sanction of law? If there be, I have yet to learn it. Why, think of it, there was not money enough in all the banks of the United States to pay 10 cents on a dollar on what they owed on demand even, saying nothing about the debts owing to them. And you call this business? I call this deliberate robbery, under the sanction of law.

The national banks alone on that date owed to their depositors $2,031,454,540.29. They owed also more than $760,000,000 to the United States and to other banks and to the officers of the United States. This is the kind of business that our Government tolerates and encourages as a business enterprise. This is the kind of business enterprise that is in the future to control our finances. Those who control these banks, those who manage this business in this way, are the men who are behind the Senate bill. They are the men who demanded that it should come here for consideration—no; to be voted on and passed, not for consideration.

Why should we increase their facilities for building up additional credits and thereby still further extract from the industries of this country an increased amount of usury? When and where is this thing to end; when are the people to be financially free; when shall their rights be protected; when shall they be taken out of hock and their own restored to them? It will not be until the members of this Senate appreciate fully their responsibilities to the people, and until they have the courage to defy the combined money interests of this country and stand by the toiling millions who pay all the debts and all the usury and support us all, including themselves. My amendment affords you an opportunity to furnish adequate financial relief to the people; the Senate bill will not. Under my amendment the national banks, at least, will have to go out of existence, and the debts they owe would have to be paid as well as the debts owing to them. They could not be injured for the very reason that their facilities for raising money would increase, the prices of their property would rise, and it would only be a few months, not to exceed five years, when this great and monstrous debt would be substantially discharged and the people to that extent liberated.

If my amendment should be enacted into law and all of the obligations of the Government now outstanding, exclusive of the bonds, were paid, there would only be in the United States the same amount of money that the Secretary reports was in the country on February 1, 1900, viz, $2,261,957,698. A large portion of this sum would soon find its way out of the Treasury, where it never ought to be and where, under the law, it has no right to be. This sum is not as great a sum as was in the country on October 1, 1865, by several hundred millions of dollars. On that date there were $2,625,053,240.16 in the United States, the greater portion of which was in circulation. At that time we only had a population of how much? About half what we have now, 35,000,000, and now we have a population estimated to be 77,116,000.

If all the bonds should be taken up and coined paper money exchanged therefor, the circulation would only be increased something over a thousand millions of dollars. This would not give to the people 50 per cent as much money as they are entitled to have and as they ought to have.

Why should not the amount of money in circulation be something near what it was in 1865; that is, $100 per head? But my amount would make it only about half that amount—only about from $50 to $60 per head.

The supporters of this Senate bill claim that one of its purposes is to increase and strengthen the credit of the Government. What is the matter with the nation's credit now? Is its credit not good enough to-day to issue its greenbacks and make its own money? Is a nation's credit better in war than in peace? Our credit thirty years ago in war was good enough to make our own money without asking the consent of any other nation or the permission of any gold syndicate. But when the friends and supporters of the Senate bill say they want to strengthen the credit of the nation they simply mean that they want to increase the number of bonds that the Government will issue and give the bondholders a larger investment.

They mean that they want to tax the people more to pay more interest on more bonds. I submit that this is the way to impair if not to destroy the nation's credit. An individual can get into debt deep enough and pile up his interest charges high enough until his credit will be impaired if not destroyed. Just so with a nation. But let me ask if a nation's credit is not good enough when every money lender is the world is anxious to get its bonds, at even a low rate of interest. Can not a nation that can issue bonds and have the unpatriotic money gamblers scrambling to secure them issue its own greenbacks and depend upon its own patriotic people to accept them? What is the difference between the greenback and the bond? The bond draws interest and the bondholder gets it. The faith of the Government is all that is behind it. How is it with the greenback? The faith of the Government is behind it, bottomed on taxes, as Jefferson said, but nobody gets any interest, and therefore it is a horrible wildcat scheme in the bondholder's eyes.

Now, who is that better for? It is simply better for the bondholders, because they get the interest. Who is it not better for? It is not better for the taxpayers, because they have to pay it. Then does the privilege that this bill gives to the taxpayers of paying interest to the bondholders strengthen the individual or strengthen the nation? Would we not be stronger if we did not pay the interest charges, as an individual would be richer if he did not pay interest charges every year? Then if we stopped issuing bonds and instead issued greenbacks, we would save the interest and be richer. Then would not the greenbacks be better than the bonds in the amount of interest that we would save? Would not the Government's credit be enhanced by just that much, to say nothing of the wonderful increase of prosperity to the people who would not only not be taxed to pay interest, but who would have sufficient money to enable their labor and toil to produce prosperity for themselves and for the nation? Yes; because we are richer by the difference in the interest, and therefore our credit behind the greenback is stronger than our credit behind the bond.

Mr. President, every bond that is issued by the United States is an evidence of the bondage of the people of the United States. Bond means bondage, and bondage means slavery, and there is no bondage on earth that is so infamous, so exacting, so far-reaching, and so paralyzing as the bondage the people are under to the usurer, unless it be the bondage of sin, and it is doubted if the bondage of sin is as great as the bondage of usury.

Every bond of this Government that is outstanding is an evidence of the shortage of money in the United States. Every note issued by a national bank is an evidence of the shortage of money in the United States. The fact that banks can exist and do business is an evidence of the fact—in fact, it is conclusive proof of the fact—that the people to that extent are short on money.

The bill that is before this Senate for consideration is an admission that the people are short on money. Why should we then refuse to manufacture money for our people? When I say we, I mean Congress—Congress that has unlimited power, and whose duty it is, under the Constitution, to exercise that power. Why should we by legislation drive them into the hands of the three-ball shops of this country and compel them to hypothecate their goods, their lands, their labors, and their lives to those persons who ruin them?

Who and what is a banker? As an individual I have the greatest respect for him, but I speak of his business. When I say business I mean that of issuing and controlling the volume of the currency. But I do not blame him; I blame Congress. The banker is no other than one who lives without creating wealth and upon the wealth that is created by others. We need banks as business institutions, but not banks of issue or banks to control the circulating medium of the country.

The banker is a parasite upon the community, upon the body politic, and it is the duty of the Congress to destroy such parasites, and this can only be done by the passage of such a law as I have introduced here.

People talk about credit! Who lives on credit? The people of this country, collectively and individually, are bankrupt. The nation itself is bankrupt and the debts that we owe will, under the present system, never be paid except by the law of limitation, by repudiation, or by revolution. Every revolution that has ever been has been the result of the indebtedness of the people. The cause of every revolution is bankruptcy, the hopeless insolvency of the people in rebellion. Revolution is but another name for repudiation.

Mr. President, every time I borrow money I admit that I am short on money and every dollar of interest that I pay is an evidence of the fact that I am short on money. Thus it is that the man who is short on money is forced to submit to a condition that makes him still shorter on money, for he must pay interest for the use of it. When shall the people ever be long on money? When they have enough. That will not be, Mr. President, until Congress shall come to the relief of the people and perform its constitutional duty, until Congress shall afford them an opportunity to pay as they go by furnishing a sufficient amount of full legal-tender money, until Congress shall put every industrious, frugal, and honest man in a position where the opportunities before him, when seized and used, will give him a competence for his wife and children and enable him to pay the honest debts which he has already incurred.

Increase the volume of money in this country so that there will be no less than, say, $50 per capita in circulation this year, next year, and every year, and you will remove the causes that disturb the stability of prices by destroying the power of the banking ring to contract and expand the volume of money at will; you will destroy the fabric of credit, and you will release the people from financial bondage and make them free. Let every dollar be a full legal tender, and let every dollar of such full legal-tender money, whether manufactured of gold, silver, or paper, be increased each year in proportion to the increase of population and business, and then you will have an honest parity—a parity between the man and the dollar.

Then, and not till then, will there be no involuntary poor and no idle rich growing richer from the labor of others. All tramps but the professional tramps will disappear. The workhouses, asylums, jails, and penitentiaries of the country will be less crowded with the unfortunate. Then, and not till then, will those who labor enjoy the fruit of their labors, and no one who is able to work will suffer or starve except those who refuse to work. Then, and not till then, will we be a nation of freemen, with the door of opportunity and the road of prosperity open to every willing heart and hand.

That is all that my amendment asks for. It is within the power of Congress to do it; it is the constitutional duty of Congress to do it. No honest citizen asks for more than this. To do less is to deny justice to a brave, industrious, and patriotic people.

PRINTING REPORT OF THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I present the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota presents concurrent resolution No. 17, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, etc., That there be printed of the Report of the Philippine Commission 15,000 copies, 10,000 for the use of the House and 5,000 for the use of the Senate.

With the following amendment:

After the word "printed," in line 2, insert the words "and bound."

Mr. HITT. Can the gentleman from Minnesota inform the House whether the amendment will not cause a long delay?

Mr. HEATWOLE. I think not; I am told that they can get them out immediately.

Mr. HITT. It has been the experience heretofore that binding means delay—sometimes a month.

Mr. HOPKINS. Not in the present publishing house down here—no delay whatever.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HEATWOLE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON THE POST-OFFICE AND POST-ROADS.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to ask that such committee be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California, chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, asks unanimous consent that that committee be permitted to work during the sessions of the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SAFETY OF LONG BRIDGE.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I submit House resolution No. 115, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ask for its present consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

With the following amendment:

In line 2, after the word "hereby," strike out the word "requested" and insert "directed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF CAPITAL TRACTION COMPANY ON PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE SE.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of House bill 6243, to amend the charter of the Capital Traction Company of the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Capital Traction Company be, and the same is hereby, authorized and required, within six months from the passage of this act, to lay down an underground electric railway, with the necessary switches and turn-outs in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, through and along the following streets and avenues, namely: Beginning at the main tracks at the intersection of Pennsylvania avenue and Eighth street SE., and thence easterly along said Pennsylvania avenue with double tracks to the circle at the western approach of the Pennsylvania Avenue bridge: Provided, That the location of the tracks near the Pennsylvania Avenue bridge shall be subject to the control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the said Capital Traction Company of the District of Columbia shall have, over and respecting the route hereinbefore provided for, the same rights, powers, and privileges as it now has, or hereafter may have, by law over and respecting its other routes, and be subject in respect thereto to all the other provisions of its charter and law.

With the following amendments recommended by the committee:

Lines 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, strike out all after the word "tracks," in line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "to Fifteenth street east; thence by single track south on Fifteenth street to K street south; east on K street to the circle; north on the circle to Pennsylvania avenue; and westerly on Pennsylvania avenue to Fifteenth street east; all work to be done in accordance with plans acceptable to and approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

Also as—

"SEC. 3. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this bill the House passed in the Fifty-fifth Congress, and it simply requires the Capital Traction Company to extend its line from Eighth street SE., where it branches off to the navy-yard, along Pennsylvania avenue to the bridge, and thence around the circle near the bridge, making a loop. I ask for a vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question in this connection. Is there any possibility that this great railroad will ever accommodate the public by having a line that will come to this Capitol from Fourteenth street so that you do not have to get out to change cars in all kinds of weather? People coming to the Library or to the Capitol must change at the Treasury or at the Peace Monument, and stand around cooling their heels waiting for one or the other car to come along. I am not in favor of granting any more privileges to these companies until they show a disposition to favor the public.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Indiana that there is now a bill before our committee, to be considered, for the extension of the Pennsylvania avenue line from its terminus on C street, making the loop farther up the hill, but that it is being delayed by the location of the Baltimore and Ohio depot. When that is permanently located, that loop will be made and bring the line nearer the Capitol. I will say that the company does not accept this legislation as a favor; they do not want to construct this line on Pennsylvania avenue, but the bill is reported at the suggestion and earnest request and petitions of the citizens of that part of the city, who also came before the committee in large numbers asking for it.

Mr. STEELE. Then I am in favor of the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if it is not true that this company builds on the lines it prefers to build on, and refuses to build on other lines when they have been required to do so by an act of Congress? I want to remind the gentleman of an instance. A charter was given to this company to construct a line on the road along Florida avenue from Seventh street to North Capitol street through a densely populated portion of the city. Now, for eight years that company has refused to build that line, and I want to know if there is anything in the mind of the gentleman that will probably eventuate in legislation that will force them to construct the line?

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say that that is a matter which will be taken up later by the District Committee at this session in connection with other improvements.

Mr. MUDD. I would like to say to the gentleman from Iowa that he will observe by the reading of the bill and the reading of the report that this extension is to be built within the next six months. We not only authorize the building, but provide that it shall be built within six months. As the chairman of the committee has said, it is in response to the request of the citizens in that locality.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any limitation in this bill as to the time in which the Capital Traction Company shall build the road?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; six months.

Mr. BERRY. I would like to ask if there is any limitation as to the rate of fare?

Mr. BABCOCK. The same rule applies to this piece of construction as to the other roads in the city.

Mr. BERRY. Would it not be well to consider the question whether, if there is to be a reduction of fare, it should not be provided for in this bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to make one thing clear to the House. If this was a matter desired by the Capital Traction Company, an amendment such as the gentleman suggests might well go on the bill, but it is not; they do not desire to construct this piece of road. I doubt whether the bill becomes a law, but at the same time this House and the committee will have done its duty to these citizens who live in that part of the District when it passes this bill. I do not think it would be wise to offer an amendment to either of these bills I will call up this morning.

Mr. BERRY. I do not know about that. I am satisfied that there is a combination going on whereby the strong roads are to be used to build up the weaker roads, and make those roads where the receipts are large build up and pay for the suburban roads, which is not for the good of the city of Washington. There are some roads in Washington paying 9 or 10 per cent, and the receipts ought to be reduced, because the street franchises belong to the public.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to know what the gentleman means when he says that he does not think this bill will become a law, but that the House should do its duty toward the people by passing a bill which looks to this relief. Is the Senate going to refuse to pass a just bill or the President going to veto it? Where is the trouble?

Mr. BABCOCK. We passed a bill in this form once before. It did not become a law. I hope this bill will become a law for the benefit of the good people living along the route. But I know that the measure will meet with serious opposition before it does pass. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

RETURN OF A BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resolution, passed by the Senate on the 9th instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate Senate bill 732, relating to lights on steam pilot vessels.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the request of the Senate will be granted.

There was no objection.

THE CAPITAL TRACTION COMPANY.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2826) authorizing and requiring certain extensions to be made to the lines of the Capital Traction Company of the District of Columbia.

The Clerk, was proceeding to read the bill, when

Mr. BABCOCK said: Mr. Speaker, the committee reported a substitute for this bill. I ask that the substitute be read in lieu of the original bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Capital Traction Company, of the District of Columbia, be, and it is hereby, authorized and required to construct the necessary tracks and to make the necessary connections for the purpose of operating its cars by the underground electric system, and to operate the same over and along the following route, namely: Beginning at the intersection of Pennsylvania avenue and Seventeenth street northwest; south on Seventeenth street by double tracks to G street northwest; west on G street by single track to Twenty-fifth street; north on Twenty-fifth street by single track to Pennsylvania avenue. Also, beginning with the tracks at the corner of Seventeenth and G streets northwest; south on Seventeenth street by single track to F street northwest; west on F street by single track to Twenty-sixth street northwest; north on Twenty-sixth street by single track to Pennsylvania avenue: Provided, That for the purpose of furnishing a loop for use when necessary, a single track may be extended along G street northwest from Twenty-fifth to Twenty-sixth streets, connecting with the single track in Twenty-fifth and Twenty-sixth streets northwest.

"SEC. 2. That the extensions herein authorized shall be completed and cars operated over the same within one year from the date of the passage of this act.

"SEC. 3. That the extensions herein authorized shall be constructed in accordance with plans satisfactory to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and approved by them.

"SEC. 4. That the said Capital Traction Company shall have, over and respecting the routes herein provided for, the same rights, powers, and privileges it now has over and respecting its other routes, and be subject in respect thereto to all the other provisions of its charter and law.

"SEC. 5. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this is also a bill which was passed by the House in the Fifty-fifth Congress. It provides for an extension of the lines of the Traction Company beyond the War and Navy Department building. That is a portion of the city where the people have had no street-car facilities. The matter of extending railroad lines into that section has been a bone of contention between the different railroad lines, the question being which should occupy that territory. The Traction Company has protested against any other company building a line through this section, and still it did not want to make the extension itself for the reason that the people living there can, by walking five or six squares, get to this company's main line.

This bill provides for a single track down G and back by way of F street. This extension will accommodate the citizens of the oldest part of Washington. It is a measure which, like the bill just passed, looks to the accommodation of the people and will give them the rapid-transit facilities which they have been asking for during some years. I ask for a vote.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY]?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BERRY. It seems to me, sir, that while some very important questions connected with the subject of reduction of fares are before the District of Columbia Committee, it is well not to extend too many of these corporate privileges, which are very valuable indeed. Two systems of railroad are now in combination in this city endeavoring to control the entire travel of the city. I do not know why it is, but some of these companies have gone out of the District to obtain corporate privileges.

I see, for instance, that the Metropolitan Company, which controls the Ninth street line, has gone to the State of Virginia to obtain corporate privileges; and now they come back to the city of Washington and undertake to control seven or eight lines of railway. The Capital Traction Company, which was the oldest and most profitable road in the city, is here all the time seeking new legislation. There are now two principal car lines of this city, and it looks to me as if they had entered into a combination to control railway passenger transit and railroad fares, too, in the city of Washington.

I think, sir, before these extensions go too far there ought to be something settled in regard to the question what the rate of fare is to be; what is a fair rate as between citizens and the companies. I apprehend that in the better class of cities all over this country we are going to have at a very early day a 3-cent fare. The 5-cent fare was originally fixed when 5 cents was the lowest convenient denomination of currency. But, sir, to the poor man it makes a great deal of difference in the course of the year whether he pays a 3-cent fare or a 5-cent fare. These companies have succeeded in suppressing all the popular and cheaper modes of transit for the poorer classes of people. The old herdic coaches are now charging a full 5-cent fare, with exchange tickets.

I think, sir, if there is any city in the world where a 3-cent fare could be adopted with propriety and success, it is the city of Washington. It has been adopted in Detroit; and the discussion there has proved very clearly that the 3-cent fare can be made sufficiently profitable to the railroad companies. These corporations grow very rapidly. In the city of Washington they are developing every day, and with the thousands of strangers who come here and furnish patronage to these roads, there is no doubt in my mind that a 3-cent fare can ultimately be adopted, not only with satisfaction to the people, but with such a profit to the companies as will furnish a reasonable return on the cost of constructing the road, and that is all they ought to expect—a reasonable interest on the amount invested in the enterprise.

I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Wisconsin will not press too many of these bills until that question of a reduction of fares now pending in his committee has been fully considered.

Mr. BABCOCK. One word in answer to my friend from Kentucky. I wish to say to him that neither the chairman of the committee nor the committee itself will press any railroad bills at present except those which, like the present and the previous bill, are demanded by the people. The company does not ask for the passage of this bill—does not want to build this line. The gentleman from Kentucky I know would not for one moment delay legislation of this kind, which has in view simply the interests of the people who live in the section of the city through which these roads pass.

Mr. BERRY. It is growing to be the rule in many of our cities that when a corporate franchise is to be granted it shall be offered to public competition, it being ascertained in this way who will offer most for the privilege of constructing and operating the road.

Now, that, I think, is a proper way. These franchises ought not to be given to a selected few. This city heretofore has had seven or eight or ten roads. I understand that since last July seven of these roads have been purchased, have gone into a combination, a company being organized down in Norfolk, in the State of Virginia, and not in the District of Columbia, and that company has come here with a view of consolidating these roads and put them into one. Litigation has been instituted by Mrs. Leiter, who has been drawing 9 or 10 per cent dividends on her stock in the Ninth street line, because that company have been devoting the earnings of that line to the construction and maintenance of roads outside of the city that are not productive.

Now, I think when a road running on a given line in Washington or anywhere else becomes so profitable that it pays 9 or 10 per cent, it is time that the fares on that road ought to be reduced instead of taking the proceeds of that line and paying them out for the purpose of developing property in the country for the benefit of other men. Most of these roads running out into the suburbs have been built with a view of developing real estate and increasing its value, and the builders of those lines have long since realized their profit in the increased value of the real estate. Then they come in, and, having gotten back the cost of the road in that way, they turn the road back into one of these combinations in the city of Washington and take a large block of stock, and thus the people are compelled, by paying a higher rate than they ought, to pay for the development of these new lines and this suburban property.

Now, I ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. BABCOCK] if you are going to extend a road in this city, why is it not fair that the privilege of constructing and operating that road should be open to the highest bidder, letting everybody have a chance to bid upon it, instead of giving the privilege to the company that is now seeking it?

Mr. BABCOCK. I have tried to make myself clear on that point before. There is no company that wants to build a road in this section of the city, and the only way to get the road there for the accommodation of the people is by this kind of legislation, which requires its construction. The Capital Traction Company will never build a line there at their own suggestion, because they are getting the travel from that neighborhood now; only the people have to walk from three to six or seven blocks to get to the car, and the argument made by the company is, "We will not get any greater return after building this line than we are already getting. We have the business already, and it is no object for us to godown in there and extend our line, for that reason." Now, that is the situation.

Mr. BERRY. The point to which I wish to direct the attention of the chairman of the committee is this: This is a public franchise. Now, in the city of Detroit the people have endeavored to purchase the lines there, estimated by fair and competent judges to be worth $9,000,000; and when they wanted to buy them, for the purpose of getting a 3-cent fare throughout the city, the company wanted $8,000,000 for the bare franchise, the right which is being ceded by this act this morning, the right to lay tracks and run cars through certain streets in the city. Now, instead of authorizing this particular company to do this, and giving that privilege to this company which is already in existence, would it not be better to have a public advertisement, and let everybody come in and have a chance to bid for the privilege of building this line. If you or I or anybody has the money to build the line, let him come in and make a bid, stating the terms upon which he will construct this road. That seems to be much the fairer way than to give the privilege to some particular company that is already in existence, as this legislation proposes to do.

Mr. BABCOCK. No one would build a line there.

Mr. BERRY. How do you know they would not until you try it?

Mr. BABCOCK. Simply because it is a question of dollars and cents. No one could afford to build a line there.

Mr. BERRY. There is no class of property as much sought after in this country as street railroad property. They are going all over the country seeking these privileges, and they have gone now to the Hawaiian Islands. Mr. Johnson, the great leader of the steel-rail trust on this floor in former Congresses, has now built roads in Honolulu; and it will not be long until they will want to build them in the Philippine Islands, the Sulus, and everywhere else. Let the franchises be put up and bid on by anybody who desires to do so. There will be no relief to poor people anywhere unless some such course is adopted.

Mr. BABCOCK. If we were to take that course, it would mean that there would be no road built in this particular section of the city.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if the gentleman will allow me just a moment, I think we are in pretty good condition in Washington about our street railways. I have seen the companies under compulsory legislation abandon the horse cars. I have seen them under legislation construct additional lines, which are the best lines to be found anywhere on earth, and to-day, as never before until within the last three months, you can ride pretty much all over this city on one fare.

Now, much can be said about letting everybody build a railroad and operate a railroad. When you do that, if that is to be the permanent policy, you will have to pay three or four fares to get where you now get on one fare. And I want to say in that connection that a street railway is a monopoly, pure and simple. They have the franchise to take the public streets. They are amenable to legislation, and they ought to be amenable to legislation, and it is much better to have them so amenable and to have universal transfers than it would be to have a dozen companies or two dozen companies with poor service. I think the best way is to just recognize the fact that it is a monopoly, and I hope that either by legislation or their own action in the near future universal transfers may be given everywhere throughout the District of Columbia.

I wish the Capital Traction Company and the Metropolitan Company were one company, because therein you would have the advantage of the citizens for one-half the price now paid, and the one company would be amenable to legislation by Congress.

I know it is fashionable to talk about monopolies, and all this, that, and the other. I have no patience with monopolies, except where the people are interested in the monopoly. Now, in the case of street railways, if they are monopolies, the people are interested in having one monopoly instead of a dozen, and then regulating the one, and riding universally throughout the whole system on one fare, instead of on two or three fares.

Mr. BERRY. I think the gentleman from Illinois is absolutely consistent with the principles of his party in encouraging a trust in street railroads in the city of Washington. I do not say for a moment that he is inconsistent, but I say that he is consistent with the great idea of the Republican party upon that subject. But I wish to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that when we are passing legislation which relates to the District of Columbia we are sitting here simply as the trustees of the city of Washington; and if you will examine every act relating to these different street railroad companies, you will find that every one provides at the conclusion of it that the power to alter, amend, or repeal at the will of Congress is expressly reserved.

Now, I wish there were a law to-day that wherever the lines of the Metropolitan Company and the lines of the Capital Traction Company, the two great corporations of this city, touch each other, they should give transfers, and you have the power, under all the legislation you have heretofore passed, to make a regulation of that kind. I do not believe in having it all in the hands of one company. I think it would be better if it were divided up.

Here is the first road which was built in the city of Washington, built in 1862, from the navy-yard to Georgetown, and that line to-day, if it were not supporting other lines extending out into the country, I think would pay 10, 12, or 15 per cent upon the capital invested.

But why should there not be a reduction in the rates of fare which are paid by the people? The streets belong to the people. Gentlemen say they belong to the Government, but they belong to the people at last, and they are the ones who ought to be protected here, and this is the only place in which they can get protection.

Now, if you are going to build a railroad, let the right to construct it be advertised, and let everyone have a chance to bid upon it. I believe the Ninth street line has reported to the Speaker of this House, in a report dated, I think, on the 1st of February, that it earned between 9 and 10 per cent upon its capital last year. Why should not the rate of fare upon that road be reduced until the people who have capital invested in the road will get not more than 4 or 5 per cent, the reasonable rate of interest upon money at this time?

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says you can ride all over this town on one fare. Yes, if a man simply wants to go out riding, he can ride a long distance on one fare; but how many people use the street cars for that purpose? They get on and get off every three or four squares; and if I come down to the Capitol, stopping at the various Departments, I am compelled to pay two or three fares in the course of my journey.

I do not see the object in presenting this legislation at this time. If there is a necessity for it, let it be subject to public bidding and competition, and whoever will bid the most for the privilege of carrying the people over that particular line, let the privilege be given to that company.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to have a moment.

Mr. BABCOCK. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CANNON. Not to exceed five minutes further, and probably not three minutes.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I supposed, Mr. Chairman, that we were in good faith discussing this legislation. I venture the prediction that the gentleman from Kentucky is talking to the galleries and does not care much. I express myself modestly about the street railway system in Washington.

Now, then, I was discussing the street railway system in Washington. I am somewhat familiar with it. I had the honor to preside over the committee that enacted a clause that these street railway systems should forsake the horse and go to electricity or the cable; and we provided it should be done in a certain time under penalty of forfeiture of the charter. The Traction line—the Washington and Georgetown line—adopted the cable. The Metropolitan line, with one or two exceptions, adopted electricity; and that was so much better than the cable that the Pennsylvania avenue line threw away the cable—it was losing its business—and put in the electric motor.

Now, then, the gentleman said he would like many companies. We had many companies for many years while the gentleman and I were here and their service was rickety horse cars, that went a mile and a half in half an hour, and we had to stand up most of the time. The gentleman recollects it and so do I. We go in one-half the time now that we formerly did and we go four or five times farther than we formerly did for the same fare. The gentleman says it is a great monopoly. Take the Metropolitan line; they are building out to the suburbs and constructing new roads. Yes, they are; and they are constructing a better line of road than exists anywhere else on earth, and you are carried over every mile or half mile additional road constructed for the same fare.

The gentleman says this is a monopoly, and "the gentleman from Illinois" is in favor of it, because it is in harmony with his party, that believes in monopolies. I thank God that I survey the universe through a window: I do not look through a gimlet hole. [Laughter.] I say again, and say it with great respect, without espousing the cause of monopolies, I stand ready to vote for such legislation as will guard the city as it has been done in the past; legislate as best we can in the interest of the people and in the interest of the greatest good to the greatest number.

But I say again, and the gentleman's denunciation shall not keep me from saying it, that street railways are monopolies. In the first place it is a franchise to use the public streets, and when you give the franchise, and they construct the railroad, it is necessarily a monopoly; and the way to regulate it is to require it to build lines that may not be to its interest to build, but, fairly, where it will accommodate the people. That is this bill. The line that it is now sought to be built by this bill is to serve that portion of the city that is accommodated now by a rickety old herdic line, that goes down one street toward the old Naval Observatory and comes back on another. The gentleman in charge of the bill says that the company do not want to build this road. This bill says, "You will build it whether you want to built it or not; you have got a monopoly, and we are exercising the power we have to compel you to give suitable accommodation to the people."

Mr. BERRY. Just one word in reply.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. BABCOCK. I would like to go on with the bills that we have here for consideration. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BERRY. Three or four minutes.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BERRY. I am glad that the gentleman from Illinois, whom I have known so many years, for I have been acquainted with him for nearly a half a century, when he was a law student, says he does not see the universe through a gimlet hole. I thought his horizon was much greater, for when he charges me with taking the time of the House in this matter he is a gentleman who makes more speeches than any other man, and he can consume enough time on appropriations, but when he gets ready he takes me to task about a matter in the District of Columbia, upon which committee neither he nor I are members.

I am ready to respond to him with reference to these matters concerning street railroads and with reference to the fares. I have a bill asking this company, and everybody recognizes that it is a proper measure, to protect the motormen against storms. The gentleman knows its importance as well as I do, because he and I and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] were afraid to venture out of the Capitol in the storm, and yet these motormen were taken off the cars half dead with the cold, and these companies are opposed to giving them the necessary protection.

It will cost a man who travels around the town all day, especially if he obliges a friend now and then, 25 to 50 cents a day for car fare. I say that this company ought to give us a night car before we extend any further franchises to them. Give us a car that shall run around the town all night, so that whenever a man wants to go home, whether it is 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, he can do so, and not make it necessary for a gentleman with a low-cut vest on, when he wants to get home at 2 o'clock in the morning, to pay out $2 for a cab, but give him a chance to get a street car, as he can even in my little town. I can step out any fifteen minutes and find a car that will take me to any place in the city of Cincinnati at any hour of the night. These gentlemen are all making a strenuous fight before the committee because they do not want to adopt these improvements.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to inquire of the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether there is more than one system of street railroads in the city of Newport, in which the gentleman lives?

Mr. BERRY. No.

Mr. BROMWELL. Did the gentleman ever lift up his voice against the monopoly of street railways?

Mr. BERRY. Yes; when the street-car fares were 10 cents, and at one time they were 12.

Mr. BROMWELL. Why did he not advocate letting the construction of street railways out to the highest bidder?

Mr. BERRY. I would like to know where the gentleman from Ohio gets into this fight [laughter]; he must get in the same way the gentleman from Illinois does.

Mr. BROMWELL. This is a free fight for all. [Laughter.]

Mr. BERRY. It is a most remarkable fact that the gentleman should come here in the defense of street railroads who do not need any defense. They go down to Norfolk and organize a company and come up here and attempt to buy up the whole street system of Washington.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I desire to say one thing in answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL]. I desire to say that under the law of Kentucky you have to let out all franchises to the highest bidder.

Mr. BERRY. That is a fact. We never construct a piece of street railway without letting it out to the highest bidder. The gentleman from Ohio knows that in his city they got a franchise from the legislature to run a street railroad for fifty years without modification. But I do not want to bring those things up here.

Mr. BROMWELL. That is so. I would like to know if the gentleman knows of any system, considering the facilities for transportation, the rate of fares, that is better than the street-car system of Cincinnati?

Mr. BERRY. That street-car system is very good. They have a central point where more cars pass the square than any other that I know of. Some of the things about it are not the best in the world. That is all I want to say about this matter. I want the House to understand that the railroad is fighting all efforts against extension, fighting all efforts for protecting the motormen or accommodating the passengers in the night.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the stock of the street-car company is worth four to one, and yet they are kicking about putting up protection for the motormen. As the gentleman from Kentucky says, some of the motormen are often taken off from the front of the cars nearly dead. We see the cars down on G or H street which have protection in front of them, and I do not see why we do not have them on all cars, and especially on those that have a longer line and colder routes.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say to the gentleman that the committee has a bill of that kind under consideration and has given it two hearings already and is to have a further hearing.

Mr. GAINES. What are the prospects for getting that protection?

Mr. BROMWELL. Oh, he can not answer that question.

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not see how I can predicate what the action of seventeen members of the committee will be.

Mr. GAINES. Is the gentleman in favor of protection of that sort?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a statement on this question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BABCOCK. I will yield three minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I do not want the members of the House to misunderstand this legislation. This is almost a Populistic bill. This is a bill to make a railroad do something for the benefit of the people that it would not do itself. This bill is to make this company build a road where there is none now in order to serve the people, without any reference to whether it is a benefit to the railroad company or not. Three-cent fares, if they come—and I would be in favor of 1-cent fares when the receipts of the railroad company would warrant it—will apply to the new branches just the same as to the main line. The object of the bill is not to grant any favor to the railroad company, but to compel an unwilling railroad corporation to do that which the people in this section of the city demand, and I do not think it is subject to the criticism that it is in favor of the corporation.

Mr. BERRY. Would the gentleman have any objection to my offering an amendment? I hope at least he will allow it to be read.

Mr. BABCOCK. I have no objection to the reading of the amendment; but I shall object to the offering of any amendment.

Mr. BERRY. Let the amendment be read for information.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to allow this amendment to be offered?

Mr. BABCOCK. Only that it may be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment of Mr. BERRY, as follows:

Amend by requiring that all cars operated in city of Washington shall be vestibuled for protection of motormen and that the companies shall run their cars every fifteen minutes from 1.30 a. m to 5.45 a. m.

Mr. MUDD. I rise to a point of order on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not pending; it was only read for information.

The question being taken on the amendment reported by the committee in the form of a substitute, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF RHODE ISLAND AVENUE.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 119) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend Rhode Island avenue," approved February 10, 1899.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to extend Rhode Island avenue," approved February 10, 1899, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding to the sixth section thereof, at the end thereof, the following proviso, namely: "Provided, That no appeal by any interested party from any decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia confirming said assessment or assessments shall delay or prevent the payment of said awards in respect to the property condemned."

Mr. JENKINS. I ask for a vote.

The question being taken, the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POTOMAC INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7737) to change the name of the Potomac Insurance Company of Georgetown, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to incorporate a fire insurance company in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia," approved the 2d of March, 1831, and the act entitled "An act to amend the charter of the Potomac Fire Insurance Company of Georgetown," approved the 3d of March, 1837, and the act entitled "An act to renew and continue in force the charter of the Potomac Insurance Company of Georgetown," approved the 27th of January, 1851, and the act entitled "An act to renew and continue in force the charter of the Potomac Insurance Company of Georgetown, D. C.," approved the 25th of March, 1870, be, and the same are hereby, amended so that the name and style of said company shall hereafter be "The Potomac Insurance Company of the District of Columbia."

SEC. 2. That the act of March 2, 1831, above referred to, be amended by inserting the words "a board of not less than," immediately before the words "twelve directors" where they occur in section 6 of said act; and to further amend said act by striking out all the words of section 7 thereof and substituting in lieu thereof the following words: "Each stockholder shall be entitled to vote in person or by agent or proxy appointed under his hand and seal, attested by one witness, at all stockholders' meetings, and shall have one vote for each share recorded in his name on the books of the company;" and to further amend said act by striking out of section 8 the words "not exceeding $10,000 in any one policy" and the words "in Georgetown" where they occur in said section; and to further amend said act by striking out section 9 in full, and by striking from section 10 the words "not oftener than once in six months."

SEC. 3. That the act of March 3, 1837, above mentioned, be amended by adding at the end of section 2 the words "and the board of directors created under this charter shall have the power to increase the capital stock at any time to any amount not in excess of $1,000,000."

Mr. JENKINS. I ask for a vote.

The question being taken, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WASHINGTON HEIGHTS TRACTION RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4604) to amend the charter of the Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the bill, when,

Mr. MUDD said: The committee have reported a substitute, and I ask that the substitute be read in lieu of the original bill.

There being no objection, the substitute was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the charter of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company, of the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize and permit the said company to lay down its tracks and operate its cars from its present authorized terminus at the western approach to the Pennsylvania Avenue bridge, as provided in section 1 of the act of incorporation; thence north on Seventeenth street east to East Capitol street; thence west on East Capitol street to Fifteenth street east, connecting with the Metropolitan Railway; also from the intersection of Minnesota avenue and Harrison street; thence westerly on Harrison street to Pierce street; thence southerly on Pierce street to Jackson street; thence westerly along Jackson street to Monroe street; also northward along the Anacostia road to connect with the Columbia Railway at Benning, over a route and at a point acceptable to and approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia: Provided, That said railway shall be removed from Anacostia road and placed in Minnesota avenue within one year after said avenue is opened up as a public thoroughfare.

"SEC. 2. That the time within which the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company is required to complete and put in operation its railroad be, and the same is hereby, extended for the term of two years from the 18th day of June, 1900.

"SEC. 3. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

Mr. MUDD. This bill, with the exception of a short additional line authorized from the western approach of the Pennsylvania Avenue bridge to Fifteenth street and East Capitol street, provides for an exclusively suburban road. The bill grants an extension of two years' time within which the company may complete this road.

The reason for asking this extension of time is that when this franchise was originally granted it brought this road, which, as I have already said, is a suburban road, only up to the western approach of the Pennsylvania Avenue bridge, leaving no means of completing the line so as to bring passengers into the central portion of the city. At the same time we did this we passed a bill, already alluded to by the chairman of the committee this morning, pending the consideration of a bill for a similar purpose, authorizing and requiring the Capital Traction Company to build its road on Pennsylvania avenue from Eighth street SE. down to the point at which this road is allowed to enter the city after crossing the river. The bill chartering the suburban railroad was passed by both branches of Congress and signed by the President. The bill giving a similar privilege to the Capital Traction Company was, as the chairman has already stated, passed by the House, but failed in the Senate, having been tied up, I believe, with several other propositions to which the House did not see fit to give its approval.

The only additional time provided by this bill for the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company is asked for the very satisfactory reason that the company has not completed its road because under existing conditions of law passengers have no means of getting to the central portion of the city, or any farther into the city than the west side of the Anacostia River, and in this condition of things capital could not readily be induced to interest itself in the enterprise.

The only changes made in the route of this line are in the nature of some slight alterations of streets, or perhaps I should say country roads, across the Anacostia River. These changes in my judgment provide better service and give greater facilities to the people, with less inconvenience, than would be the case under the provisions of the original act. I apprehend there will be no controversy or objection in regard to this proposition. It is approved by the Commissioners, unanimously reported by the committee, and is in response to the wishes and the interests of the community through which the road is to be constructed.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Is there anything either in the general law or in the charter of these companies inflicting a penalty or forfeiture for failure to complete their road within the time limited?

Mr. BABCOCK. Under the general law I believe the charters are forfeited if the companies fail to comply with the requirements of Congress. There are no specific penalties.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. That is provided in the original charter.

Mr. MUDD. Yes; in the original charter, as I understand, of this company.

The question being taken, the substitute reported by the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MUDD, a motion to reconsider the vote last taken was laid on the table.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] to present a resolution.

LEAVE TO COMMITTEE ON JUDICIARY TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, authorized to sit during the sessions of the House of the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF COLUMBIA ROAD.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7950) for the extension of Columbia road east of Thirteenth street, and for other purposes, for which a substitute has been reported. I ask that the reading of the bill be omitted and that the substitute be read. I also ask, in the same connection, that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CANNON). The gentleman asks that the reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the substitute may be read. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That within twenty days after the passage of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting as a district court, by petition, particularly describing the lands to be taken, a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of Columbia road east of Thirteenth street, through block 23 of Columbia Heights, with a width of 60 feet, so that the western terminus of Steuben street will be connected in a direct manner with the eastern terminus of Columbia road as now located west of Thirteenth street.

SEC. 2. That of the amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land condemned for the extension of Columbia road as herein provided, one-half thereof shall be assessed by the jury hereinafter provided as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits, against those pieces or parcels of land on each side of said Columbia road as extended through block 23 of Columbia Heights, and also on any or all pieces or parcels of land which will be benefited by the extension of said Columbia road; and in determining the amounts to be assessed against said pieces or parcels of land the jury shall take into consideration the respective situations of such pieces or parcels of land and the benefits they may severally receive from the extension of Columbia road as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That the said court shall cause public notice of not less than ten days to be given of the filing of said proceedings, by advertisement in such manner as the court shall prescribe, which notice shall warn all persons having any interest in the proceedings to attend court at a day to be named in said notice and to continue in attendance until the court shall have made its final order ratifying and confirming the award of the jury; and in addition to such public notice said court, whenever in its judgment it is practicable to do so, may cause a copy of said notice to be served by the marshal of the District of Columbia, or his deputies, upon such owners of the land to be condemned as may be found by said marshal, or his deputies, within the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. That after the filing of proof of publication of the notice provided for in the preceding section, said court shall cause a jury of seven judicious, disinterested men, not related to any person interested in the proceedings, and not in the service or employment of the District of Columbia or of the United States, to be summoned by the marshal of the District of Columbia, to which jurors said court shall administer an oath or affirmation that they are not interested in any manner in the land to be condemned nor are in any way related to the parties interested therein, and that they will, without favor or partiality, to the best of their judgment, assess the damages each owner of land taken may sustain by reason of the extension of said street and the condemnation of lands for the purposes of such extension, and assess not less than one-half of the amount of such damages as hereinbefore provided. The court, before accepting the jury, shall hear any objections that may be made to any member thereof, and shall have full power to decide upon all such objections, and to excuse any juror or cause any vacancy in the jury, when impaneled, to be filled; and after said jury shall have been organized and shall have viewed the premises, said jury shall proceed, in the presence of the court, if the court shall so direct, or otherwise as the court may direct, to hear and receive such evidence as may be offered or submitted on behalf of the District of Columbia and by any person or persons having any interest in the proceedings for the extension of said street. When the hearing is concluded the jury, or a majority of them, shall return to said court, in writing, its verdict of the amount to be found due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the extension of said street under the provisions thereof, and of the pieces or parcels of land benefited by such extension and the amount of the assessment for such benefits against the same.

SEC. 5. That if the use of a part only of any piece or parcel of ground shall be condemned, the jury, in determining its value, shall not take into consideration any benefits that may accrue to the remainder thereof from the extension of said street or highway, but such benefits shall be considered in determining what assessment shall be made on or against such part of such piece or parcel of land as may not be taken as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 6. That the court shall have power to hear and determine any objections which may be filed to said verdict or award, and to set the same aside when satisfied that it is unjust or unreasonable, and in such event the proceedings shall be begun anew under the method provided in this act, and all former proceedings as to the particular land in controversy shall be null and of no effect: Provided, That said objections shall be filed within thirty days after the verdict or award of said jury.

SEC. 7. That when the verdict of said jury shall have been finally ratified and confirmed by the court, as herein provided, the amounts of money awarded and adjudged to be payable for lands taken under the provisions hereof shall be paid to the owners of said land by the Treasurer of the United States, ex officio commissioner of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia, upon the warrant of the Commissioners of said District, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia; and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of said judgments and awards is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 8. That when confirmed by the court the several assessments herein provided to be made shall severally be a lien upon the land assessed, and shall be collected as special improvement taxes in the District of Columbia, and shall be payable in four equal annual installments, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until paid.

SEC. 9. That each juror shall receive as compensation the sum of $5 per day for his services during the time he shall be actually engaged in such services under the provisions hereof.

SEC. 10. That the sum of $300 is hereby appropriated, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, to provide the necessary funds for the costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto.

SEC. 11. That no appeal by any interested party from the decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia confirming the assessment or assessments of benefits or damages herein provided for, nor any other proceeding at law or in equity by such party against the confirmation of such assessment or assessments, shall delay or prevent the payment of award to others in respect to the property condemned, nor delay or prevent the taking of any of said property sought to be condemned, nor the opening of said street: Provided, however, That upon the final determination of said appeal or other proceeding at law or in equity the amount found to be due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the extension of said street under the provisions hereof shall be paid as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PEARRE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOSEPH BACIGALUPPI.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5139) for the relief of Joseph Bacigaluppi, and I ask that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all real estate lying in the District of Columbia heretofore purchased by and conveyed to Joseph Bacigaluppi be, and the same is hereby, relieved and exempted from the operations of an act entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens, etc.," approved March 3, 1887; and that all forfeitures incurred by force of said act in respect to such real estate be, and the same are hereby, remitted; and that the title to such real estate be, and the same is hereby, vested in said Joseph Bacigaluppi as fully in every respect as though he had been a citizen of the United States at the time the same was purchased by and conveyed to him.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOHN H. GAUSE AND OTHERS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5137) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to convey a certain lot in the District of Columbia to John H. Gause and others, and I ask that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant and convey by quitclaim deed to the said John H. Gause and Charles E. Gause, of the city of Washington, as tenants in common, their heirs and assigns, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to a certain lot of land in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, known upon the plat or plan of said city as lot No. 10, in square No. 1041. This act shall have the effect only of a quitclaim of all the right, title, and interest of the United States therein, but shall not effect an adverse title to said land, if any, nor create any liability on the part of the United States, nor operate to discharge any taxes or assessments levied thereon by the District of Columbia; but the deed shall not be delivered until satisfactory proof has been made that all taxes and assessments, both general and special, levied on said lot by the District of Columbia, have been paid.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, that is all the business, I believe, to be presented to day by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

TRANSPORTATION OF GOODS IN BOND.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 3334, and I ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Perhaps the bill had better be read first

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3334) to amend section 3005 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of this bill and that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, we should like to have the bill read for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire to have it read before the question is put?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; for information.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3005 of the Revised Statutes o the United States be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3005. All merchandise arriving at any port of the United States destined for any foreign country may be entered at the custom-house, and conveyed, in transit, through the territory of the United States, without the payment of duties, under such regulations as to examination and transportation as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to suspend the operation of this act in so far as the same permits goods, wares, and merchandise to be transported in bond through the United States into the Free Zone of Mexico, so long as the Mexican Free Zone law exists: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to prevent the transportation of merchandise in bond to be delivered at points in the territory of Mexico beyond the limits of said Free Zone.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the bill as it has been read, but I have objection to an amendment which I understand is to be offered to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will object unless the gentleman will agree not to introduce that amendment. The gentleman knows the amendment to which I refer.

Mr. PAYNE. I can not agree to that, of course. I am directed by the committee to offer the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Unless you will make that agreement.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering revenue bills.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering revenue bills, with Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 3334.

The bill was read.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Section 3005 of the Revised Statutes, which this bill seeks to amend, reads as follows:

All merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, Portland in Maine, or any port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, or arriving at the port of Brownsville, in Texas, or any other port specifically designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the Republic of Mexico, may be entered at the custom-house and conveyed in transit through the territory of the United States, without the payment of duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

It will be seen by the House that the present law authorizes goods from a foreign country to be taken in transit through the United States only when destined to the British provinces on the north or to Mexico on the south, and does not make any provision for the new trade which has sprung up within the last few years with reference to goods transported from European ports to Japan and to other countries of the Orient. It is necessary that such goods pay the duty in going across the United States, or else that they be transported through Canada by the Canadian roads, where they may be taken in bond. The object of this bill is to make it universal, so that any goods exported from any foreign country may pass through the United States to the port of another foreign country in bond, in order to facilitate the transportation of such goods through the United States, so that our transportation companies may be allowed to share in the trade, which is becoming larger every year. The only object, so far as this bill is concerned, is to extend that privilege and make it universal. The bill as unanimously reported from the Committee on Ways and Means contained a clause retaining the present status of the United States in reference to the Mexican Free Zone.

Members of the House know that the Mexican Free Zone is a strip of land along the Mexican border into which, by a treaty between Mexico and the United States, goods may be exported in bond from either country and remain there in bond. When exported beyond the limits of this zone into the foreign country, they are required to pay duty.

This Mexican Free Zone has been fruitful in evasions of the revenue laws. There has been a great deal of smuggling along the border. In 1895 Congress sought, by legislation, to get rid of this Free Zone, and passed a bill for that purpose, withdrawing the privileges that might accrue to the United States from the existence of this Free Zone; and that has been the law since 1895, in the hope that Mexico, by treaty, might also join with us and abolish this anomaly in our revenue laws.

But the purpose of that bill has failed. Mexico refuses to join with us in abolishing this Free Zone, and I am told at the Treasury Department that it has not stopped smuggling in the least degree. The bill is reported as it came to the committee. I see the gentleman is referring to the report. From later information we have received on the subject, the amendment is to be offered.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection to the bill you have introduced, because the last provision there covers exactly the question we want.

Mr. PAYNE. That is the point.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But I do object to the amendment that is to be proposed.

Mr. PAYNE. I introduced this bill at the suggestion of the Treasury Department. When introduced it contained this proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to suspend the operation of this act in so far as the same permits goods, wares, and merchandise to be transported in bond through the United States into the Free Zone of Mexico, so long as the Mexican Free Zone law exists: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to prevent the transportation of merchandise in bond to be delivered at points in the territory of Mexico beyond the limits of said Free Zone.

That was put in because otherwise we thought it would repeal the action of Congress in 1895 in passing the law to which I have just alluded, and in that way the bill was reported by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Afterwards the gentleman from Texas, I think Mr. COOPER, introduced a joint resolution providing for the repeal of the law or joint resolution which was passed in 1895, in reference to this Mexican Free Zone. That was considered in the Committee on Ways and Means, and the committee then reported in favor of the joint resolution introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER]. It was then suggested, I think, by myself, that when this bill came up in the House it would be a proper time, if so desired, to offer an amendment to this bill striking out this proviso and that appropriate legislation repealing the action of Congress in 1895 be inserted; and the committee authorized the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to report not only the resolution offered by Mr. COOPER, but also to offer it as an amendment to this bill, and I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want to raise the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move to strike out of the pending bill all after the word "prescribe," in the tenth line, and to insert in lieu thereof the following amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to be recognized to raise the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "prescribe," in line 10 of the bill, and insert the following as an additional section:

"SEC. 2. That the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution in reference to the Free Zone along the northern frontier of Mexico and adjacent to the United States,' approved March 1, 1895, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the full operation of section 3005 of the Revised Statutes as existing prior to the adoption of such joint resolution is hereby revived."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. My point of order is this: The joint resolution offered as an amendment to the bill has never been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, and the bill before the House has been reported unanimously, according to the report which I will read:

The two provisos in the bill are copied word for word from the act of Congress approved March 1, 1895. It is necessary to incorporate these provisos in the amendment, both to preserve the act of Congress of 1895, above referred to, and also to guard against the fraudulent importation of goods in bond to this Free Zone, the existence of which has facilitated the smuggling of goods into the United States.

Now, these provisos in the bill, as read, are to be repealed by this resolution (H. J. Res. 58) known as the Cooper resolution. It has not been reported to this House. I have been unable to find any report made anywhere by any committee, and the Cooper resolution is certainly contradictory of and not germane to the bill under consideration, and I think should be stricken out on the point of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand that this amendment is obnoxious to the point of order. No matter where the section comes from, I am offering an additional section to this bill under consideration. The fact that it has existed in the form of a joint resolution does not bar me from taking the same language and offering it as an amendment to the bill, adding another section to the bill, germane to the original purpose of the bill itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that the first point made by the gentleman has force in it—that it is necessary that it should be reported by a committee. It is offered as an amendment by a member of the House, and, if germane, would certainly be in order. The Chair thinks that the amendment is germane to the general purpose of the bill; and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If no member of the committee wishes to be heard——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized in support of this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER] who introduced the resolution.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I introduced the original resolution that is proposed as an amendment to this bill, and I desire to make a brief explanation, giving a few facts and history, which I think will present the argument in behalf of the measure.

The facts are these: About 1858 the Free Zone was established under the authority of the Mexican Government. At that time it extended from the Gulf on the west bank of the Rio Grande River and the west borders of Texas to the north boundary of Texas. This Free Zone is a territory about 12 or 15 miles in width, into which goods are permitted to enter from Mexico and from the United States with practically no tax, no impost duties, laid upon them.

It has some of the effects of a bonded warehouse, without the powers and privileges of a bonded warehouse. The reason why this Free Zone was established I need not state, but I will say that it was established, first, because taxes were higher in Mexico, impost duties were higher in Mexico, than in Texas, and therefore Texas was getting the trade of that country to the injury of the people of Mexico.

In consequence of the Free Zone there was smuggling from Texas over into Mexico when goods were cheaper in Texas than in Mexico, and from Mexico into Texas when they were cheaper in Mexico than in Texas. It was believed that this Government was losing some taxes in consequence of such condition. Smuggling was possibly larger from that Free Zone territory than in some other sections of the country, because it was a sparsely settled country, and the revenue agents and taxgatherers could not watch it as carefully as on some other portions of the borders.

On the Canadian boundary the same condition exists. It was believed by the Government of the United States that if they prohibited the transportation of goods into that country it would compel Mexico to repeal the law authorizing the Free Zone. Acting under that belief, in 1895 a joint resolution was passed by Congress authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to thereafter prohibit the transportation of goods to the Free Zone. That law has been in operation for some time. The Secretary of the Treasury by several letters reports that it has not prohibited or restrained any smuggling, and further recommends the passage of this resolution, that the former resolution prohibiting the transportation of goods into that country be repealed. I have his letters here.

Now, the only result of the passage of the resolution of March 5 has been to prevent the transportation through this country of goods from the seaboard and ports of this country into the Free Zone. As a consequence Tampico and Vera Cruz, Mexico, receive all the goods intended for the Free Zone. The Mexican railroads haul them. The goods go to the Free Zone just as they went heretofore before the law of March 5, 1895, but they are not hauled by American transportation companies, nor are they landed at American ports by which American laborers may get the benefit of it. The object of this bill is to repeal that inhibition and let the goods go in bond—let them be landed at American ports and be hauled by Ameican transportation companies to the Free Zone.

Now, when these goods reach the Free Zone and are reshipped to the United States they have to pay the impost duties imposed by the United States. If they go into the Mexican States south or west of this zone, they have to pay the duties levied by those States. Therefore it acts simply as a bonded warehouse. Goods going into the Free Zone do not go absolutely free, but practically free. The tax or impost duties have been from 2 to 18½ per cent.

Now, I am advised by the Treasury Department that the statute has not prevented smuggling, but has had a tendency to encourage it, for this reason: When the goods are landed at Mexican ports and transported by Mexican railroads to this Free Zone, the goods are unknown, undesignated, not identified by the officers of the United States. But if they were landed at American ports and transported by American transportation companies, the Secretary of the Treasury would have some knowledge of the goods carried, their value, their character, and, therefore, would be able to identify them to prevent smuggling.

We all agree that smuggling across the borders ought to be prohibited. The American people would like to have some law prohibiting it, but it is increasing instead of decreasing. It was expected when the resolution of 1895 was passed that it would compel Mexico to repeal the law creating the Free Zone; but it has failed of its purpose, and the only object obtained is that it prohibits American people and transportation companies from handling the goods, wares, and merchandise that go to the Free Zone, and therefore has taken away from them that much money that would have gone into the pockets of the American people.

These were the reasons that prompted me to introduce the resolution. There are three Representatives from Texas who represent territory on the Mexican border (the Free Zone). It is understood that two of my colleagues favor this resolution, this amendment, and the other, who is as sincere as the rest of us, is opposed to it for reasons which he will give to the House.

When the resolution of 1895 was originally passed, it was then bitterly opposed by the Representative from Texas in Congress, Mr. Crain, who represented, I think, the largest territory bordering on the Free Zone, and he succeeded, in this branch of Congress, in eliminating that part of the territory which he represented, from the provisions of this bill.

It went to the Senate and there was amended for the reason, urged by the Senate, that if you make a part of territory open to goods transported into the Free Zone, and prohibit their transportation into another part, you discriminate in favor of particular railroads to the disadvantage of other roads and to the people of this country. Therefore, they said, if the resolution will accomplish the end you are after, it should extend along and cover the entire border.

As I have said, I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury stating that the act of March 5, 1895, has not accomplished the purpose intended. I have no interest in this measure except to have the goods, wares, and merchandise that are transported into the Free Zone landed at the ports of Texas and transported by American railroads and handled by American laborers.

I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to state a single matter which I think ought to be controlling upon the action of the House with reference to this bill. The difficulty under which the United States labors in the matter of smuggling, as described to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, grows out of the fact that we have no record of these goods. If these goods carried into the Free Zone came over our own transportation lines and crossed the Mexican border through our own custom-houses we would have a record by which we could afterwards trace goods that are smuggled back into our country. But when they come through the Mexican lines of transportation we have no knowledge of those goods and no way whatever to trace them.

I made the former report on this bill—a bill which was passed by the House and Senate, but which was too late I believe for the signature of the Speaker. I think this bill is in the interest of good government, and I do not see how it can possibly have any undesirable effect on anybody's constituents, unless in the way described by a certain member of the House from the State of Texas who once said that the only persons he knew who could oppose the destruction of this limitation must be some persons who were carrying on to some extent the business of smuggling across that line. He went a little farther than I will go—indeed a good deal farther; for I do not know anything about the circumstances down there. But if we leave the law as it now is, it certainly is a very bad condition for us to leave our Treasury in, especially when every Secretary of the Treasury as far back as Secretary Fairchild has tried to get rid of this trouble.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] whatever time he wants.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to be recognized in my own time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to explain to the members of the House what this Free Zone is and how it originated. It is a strip of Mexican territory, 13 miles wide, extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the Gulf of California, the boundary between the United States and Mexico, forming the north line of the Free Zone. It touches the south boundary line of Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas. The largest town along that boundary is the city of El Paso, in my district. In fact the revenue collected there exceeds the revenue of every other port along that boundary by more than $100,000 each year.

Therefore the interest of El Paso in this matter is greater than that of all the other towns on that border. We have five railroad lines at El Paso, which give our merchants cheap transportation to that point. We have in this respect a decided advantage over the Mexican merchants in the Mexican town of Juarez, just across the Rio Grande. The Mexican merchants have only one line of railroad extending from the Mexican seaports to Juarez. Juarez is the Mexican town directly opposite El Paso, there being nothing but a small river between them. Smuggling is very easily carried on along this boundary for the greater portion of the year, because the Rio Grande River is very often dry.

When goods are carried in bond as they are now carried from the towns of Vera Cruz and Tampico, Mexico, and landed in Juarez, on the Free Zone, they can not be sold by the Mexican merchants living in that zone of Mexico much lower than they can be sold on this side of the river. The difference in the freight rates compensates us for the difference between the tariff of the United States and the Free Zone tariff. The repeal of the present law will give the Juarez merchant an advantage over the American merchant—an advantage which endangers the interests of the merchants on the American side of the river. It also produces smuggling, and in producing smuggling it injures the merchants on the American side.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Will my colleague allow a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. My colleague states, as I understand, that those goods are landed and delivered to the merchants of Juarez cheaper than to merchants of El Paso.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; cheaper because of the difference in the tariff.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Now, do not the merchants get the same goods over the Mexican railroad that they would over the American roads?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They do, but not with so cheap freight rates. That makes a difference, and a very great difference. In Mexico they have railroad monopolies as they do in the United States. Where there is but one line of railroad and merchants are compelled to carry their freight over that single line they can not compete with those who have the privilege of carrying their goods over several lines. We have what is known as a common freight point at El Paso, and goods can be brought there by rail much cheaper than they can in Juarez, Mexico, across the Rio Grande.

I will give the House a history of this Free Zone and the manner in which it originated. Immediately after the war of 1847 between the United States and Mexico the Mexicans passed a very high tariff law. The merchants on the Mexican side of the river had to pay this high rate of duty in order to get foreign goods to place in their stores. The United States during that period had a very low tariff, so that the Mexican merchants could not compete with those on the American side.

The high tariff was upon the Mexican side and the low tariff upon the American side. Mexico, in order to protect its own merchants, enacted a law making a strip of territory 13 miles wide along their north boundary line and below the American boundary a Free Zone, into which goods could be carried without the payment of tariff. That was done in order to enable the merchants of Mexico to compete with the merchants on the American side, our tariffs then being comparatively nothing.

Since the civil war conditions have been reversed. Mexico has a very low tariff in the Free Zone. Since the civil war, and up to the present time, our tariff has been very high, and it still remains high. Indeed, it is higher than ever before, under the Dingley bill. The American merchants before the passage of the Cockrell resolution in 1895, could not compete with the Free-Zone merchant across the Rio Grande River.

Our statesmen many years ago took up this question of the Free Zone and studied it and endeavored to get Mexico to repeal it. They argued with Mexico, without effect, however, and endeavored to show Mexico that it was unfair to use the advantage against the American merchants that the Free Zone merchants of Mexico had, because the goods upon the American side cost a great deal more than they did upon the Mexican side. General Grant first tried to get Mexico to repeal her Free Zone law, and afterwards Mr. Blaine, Senator Patterson, and Judge Reagan, of Texas, advocated the same policy. In 1895 the legislature of the State of Texas took up the question and passed a resolution unanimously requesting the passage of the Cockrell resolution, which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] repeals.

That resolution (known as the Cockrell resolution) was to the effect that goods should no longer be carried in bond across any portion of the United States and landed in the Free Zone of Mexico without the payment of duty. Congress, in 1895, at the request of the legislature of the State of Texas, after a full investigation, knowing that Mr. Blaine, General Grant, Senators Patterson and Reagan, and numerous other American statesmen had favored the Cockrell resolution, passed it. It has been in effect from that time until this time. Our merchants have succeeded under the law as it is now much better than they did before. Smuggling has to a great extent ceased at that boundary.

I object now to the repeal of the act of 1895. If we repeal it the Mexican merchants can easily undersell our American merchants, and, further, its repeal will offer a premium upon smuggling goods across that river from Mexico's Free Zone into the United States. The argument is made that we have injured the railroad companies of the United States by taking from them the additional freight money they would get by carrying goods from the port of entry in the United States to the Free Zone of Mexico.

According to this argument, it is a question whether or not the railroads shall carry this freight in bond across our country and get the small pittance that they will get for bringing the goods into the Free Zone and into competition with our own American merchants, and thus greatly injuring our home merchants.

Every American town on the border has a corresponding Mexican town. There are many tailors in these Mexican towns and our American people can cross over the river and buy foreign Free Zone goods, and have them made up into clothing by a Mexican tailor on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande, they can then put the clothes on and wear them across the line and bring back their old clothes in a valise. Not only that, but whisky can be taken over in Mexico in bond, landed on the Mexican side of the river, placed in bottles, and the Mexican smugglers will slip it back at night, and bring it in competition with the American manufacture of whisky. The same is true of tobacco, and goods of every kind which are manufactured by Americans.

This bill will not only injure American merchants, but also our American manufacturers. If we are to build up our home trade and home manufactures, we should not give the Englishman, the Frenchman, or the foreigner of any land the right to bring goods across our own territory in bond, and land them in this Mexican Free Zone to compete with our American merchants and manufacturers in the way I have described. I will send up and have read the report of the committee on the bill (H. R. 3334) which is now under consideration. This report sustains my contention.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3334) to amend section 3005 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, submit the following report:

On the 8th of December last the Treasury Department furnished the following memorandum explaining this bill:

Section 3005 of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

"All merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, Portland in Maine, or any port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, or arriving at the port of Brownsville in Texas, or any other port specifically designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the Republic of Mexico, may be entered at the custom-house and conveyed in transit through the territory of the United States, without the payment of duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe."

Under the authority of this statute merchandise may be transported in bond in transit through the United States from designated ports in the United States to Canada and Mexico, but there is no authority for such transportation through the United States from Canada and Mexico, or from one foreign country to another.

The changing conditions of commerce and the establishment of new transportation routes demand the enlargement of the privileges given by this statute to all foreign merchandise arriving for transit through the United States, whether to or from Canada, Mexico, or any other foreign country. The proposed change will tend to facilitate the carriage of foreign merchandise in bond through the United States by our own transportation companies, and will not in any way endanger the revenue, and is earnestly recommended.

This section, as it now stands, provides only for the carrying and transit of merchandise from foreign countries destined to either some place in Canada or in Mexico. At the time the section was passed (July 28, 1866) this answered all the requirements of commerce. Since that time a large trade has grown up with oriental countries, much of which seeks transportation through the United States.

We are losing much of the benefit of this transportation because we can not pass these goods through the country in bond. This amendment is offered in order to give a fair share of this trade to our transportation companies. It will be noted that the Secretary of the Treasury says, in the memorandum, that the passage of this bill will not endanger the revenue in any way.

The two provisos in the bill are copied word for word from the act of Congress approved March 1, 1895. It is necessary to incorporate these provisos in the amendment, both to preserve the act of Congress of 1895, above referred to, and also to guard against the fraudulent importation of goods in bond to this Free Zone, the existence of which has facilitated the smuggling of goods into the United States.

Your committee recommend the bill be passed without amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this bill has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. He states that the passage of the bill will not endanger the revenue in any way.

This bill H. R. 3334, without amendment, is exactly what we want. I make no objection to the bill, but I do object to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], which destroys the effect of the bill with reference to the Free Zone. I will read that portion of the bill which he proposes to strike out:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to suspend the operation of this act in so far as the same permits goods, wares, and merchandise to be transported in bond through the United States into the Free Zone of Mexico, so long as the Mexican Free-Zone law exists: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to prevent the transportation of merchandise in bond to be delivered at points in the territory of Mexico beyond the limits of said Free Zone.

This bill is right, and its provisions are right. As long as that Free Zone exists it is a menace to the manufacturing interests of this country and also to the merchants upon this side of the boundary line. I have no objection to the last clause in the bill. It is as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to prevent the transportation of merchandise in bond to be delivered at points in the territory of Mexico beyond the limits of said Free Zone.

That limit is 13 miles beyond the Rio Grande and consequently 13 miles beyond the boundary of the United States; and if they pass over there with their bonded goods they have to pay the full Mexican duty, but if they stop just over our line they are in the Free Zone, and consequently they can undersell our merchants and injure them to a great extent.

The question is this, whether or not we will benefit a few railroad companies by the freight they can get for taking these goods from any port in the United States into the Free Zone in bond, and thereby injure the merchants and manufacturers upon our own side of the boundary line.

I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read a statement made by a prominent citizen of El Paso in regard to this matter, which will show exactly the condition of affairs there.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN AID OF FREE ZONE—CONGRESS WILL REPEAL THE EL PASO RESOLUTION—HOW TO WORK IT—REPORT MADE BY MR. HART TO THE CUSTOMS TEXTILE AND SILK ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA—IT INJURED AMERICAN BORDER TOWNS—ENCOURAGED SMUGGLING—AT PRESENT THE FREE ZONE CAN DO EL PASO NO HARM—THINKS IT INCREASES EXPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

The following Associated Press bulletin was received yesterday:

"WASHINGTON, January 21, 1899.

"The Ways and Means Committee of the House directed this morning a favorable report on the bill of Representative COOPER of Texas, repealing the law of 1895 in reference to the Free Zone of Mexico."

In explanation of the resolution which the committee's bill is intended to repeal, the report made by Juan S. Hart, of the Times, to the Customs Textile and Silk Association of America, and published in the American Silk Association's Journal, will be found interesting reading.

This report was written by Mr. Hart at the Holland House, New York, on December 2, 1895, was addressed to officers of the American Association, and read as follows:

"GENTLEMEN: In answer to your request to give my views in regard to the effect of the Free Zone of northern Mexico upon American industries and to state my connection with recent legislation by the United States Congress on the subject, as well as to outline the present condition and suggest a course to be pursued, I respectfully submit the following brief statement:

"The 'Free Zone' of Mexico, as established in 1883, is a strip of land on its northern frontier 20 kilometers wide from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific Ocean, where the goods and merchandise of all countries of the world were admitted by the Mexican Government free of duty. Later, instead of being admitted entirely free of duty, the goods paid 3 per cent of the duties to cover expenses of inspection. The charge was afterwards increased to 5 per cent of duties, and for the last five years and at present Mexico collects 10 per cent of duties in the Free Zone. The duties are paid in Mexican silver.

"Before this Free Zone was established none but American goods were sold in the Zone.

"After its establishment European and Asiatic goods were carried there through the United States in bond.

"The quantity of the foreign goods and merchandise carried there is an enormity compared with the population and the consumption of such goods in the Free Zone. No part of Mexico is as sparsely populated as its northern frontier. There are but five cities along the thousands of miles between the Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific Ocean. American railroads pass into Mexico only at three points in the Free Zone. The few towns that exist are little agricultural settlements of very poor people, whose wants are few and who can afford no luxuries.

"The class of goods imported into the Free Zone largely consists of silks, satins, manufactured woolens, gloves, dry goods of every description, including the most expensive embroidered goods and laces. Also large invoices of opium, crockery, and glassware are carried there; in fact every article upon which the United States charges high duties is imported there in great quantities.

"If the United States Army was stationed along the frontier of Mexico to guard against smuggling these Free Zone goods in this country, it could not be entirely prevented. The Rio Grande from the Mexican Gulf to El Paso is the boundary line, and with its meanders it gives a length of over 1,000 miles, and that river is dry yearly for eight months from El Paso to the mouth of the Pecos River, over 300 miles, and from El Paso west to the Pacific Ocean there is not even a dry river to mark the boundary for 1,200 miles.

"The attention of the United States Congress was first called to this matter in 1884 by a petition signed by all the merchants and business men of El Paso, Tex., and presented in the Senate by Senators Coke and Reagan, of Texas. This petition, which is on file in Washington, showed the facilities for smuggling afforded by the Mexican Free Zone and predicted smuggling would increase daily as long as the Free Zone existed.

"The petition was referred to the State Department for information, and a pamphlet of 126 pages is on file there containing a complete discussion of the question by the Mexican minister at Washington, who is likewise strongly opposed to the existence of a Free Zone in Mexico. I will therefore not repeat any facts stated in said pamphlet, which is easy of access.

"The matter then rested until Mr. Crowley, of the special agent's department of the Treasury, called attention to it in his annual report of that year.

"This recognition and the experience of nearly eleven years encouraged the business men of El Paso to make an effort to kill the Free Zone. Up to that time the only way of getting foreign goods into the Free Zone was through the United States in bond. I went to Washington for the business men of El Paso, and succeeded in getting a resolution passed by Congress which practically closed our ports for goods intended for the Free Zone. This left the Free-Zone people helpless until May, 1895, when President Diaz, of Mexico, by proclamation opened the ports of Vera Cruz, Tampico, and Guaymas for the transportation of goods in bond to the Free Zone through Mexican territory. This had the effect of reestablishing the Free Zone in full vigor again for the dumping of foreign goods to be smuggled into the United States and into the interior of Mexico.

"During the Administration of President Cleveland the Treasury Department, for the first time, placed a special agent on duty on the frontier in El Paso. Among the duties wisely assigned by Supervisor Crowley of this official, who is stationed at El Paso, Tex., is the study of the Free Zone and its detrimental effects upon the revenue of this country. The Treasury Department is therefore in possession of facts more accurately than I can state. It suffices for me to say that daily, at El Paso, smugglers are caught, and the United States courts and Federal courts are kept busy with cases that are detected, and that these cases are but a small fraction of the violations of law that go unpunished by the small force of customs officials whose duty it is to guard such a vast and wild frontier.

"The present condition, then, arising from the Free Zone, which is now again in full vigor and effect, are that most American products sold there longer are displaced by foreign goods; that the United States is losing revenue by reason of the "smugglers paradise" which it created; that our merchants are losing trade wherever these contraband goods are sold after being successfully smuggled into this country, and that the law-abiding merchants on the frontier can not compete against those untaxed goods. The Mexican Free Zone therefore involves to this country three things.

"First. Loss of trade and its consequences;

"Second. Loss of customs revenue and even of internal revenue by furnishing a depositary with no restrictions; and

"Third. Decadence of the American frontier towns and consequent growth of the Mexican frontier towns opposite them.

"It is urged with reason that Mexico has the right to establish free trade wholly or partially within the territory, and that the United States can not interfere in those rights. But Mexico needs revenue and the majority of her people oppose the Free Zone, and the press of Mexico denounces the Free Zone as unconstitutional legislation in favor of a few and against the many. The fact is, the Free Zone law is opposed even by the producers and landowners within the Free Zone.

"The reason that they oppose it is because one clause in the law makes them pay duties on any of their own products which they sell to the interior of Mexico. So that wheat, corn, flour, fruit, wines, liquors, or anything else produced in the Free Zone, on Mexican lands by Mexican labor, must pay full Mexican duties before such products can pass into Mexico beyond the Free Zone. In other words, the products of the Free Zone are treated by Mexico as foreign products.

"The reason this clause in the law was made necessary was because before it was inserted the Free Zone merchants were resacking flour and grain and relabeling wines and liquors and selling them to the interior of Mexico as 'home products.' To avoid this abuse the said clause was inserted. And now the producers and landowners in the Free Zone are opposed to the law.

"There is no legislative remedy now for the evils described, which are growing worse daily and gaining strength, except to expend millions annually in guarding closely the 2,500 miles of frontier which we have with Mexico. The Mexican Government has a large force of customs guards, called the "Gendarmeria," but the smuggling in that direction is very small compared with what is done into the United States. The reason less contraband goods enter Mexico is because their money is depreciated at least one-half and these foreign goods must be paid for in gold or its equivalent, and Mexican buyers are therefore restricting themselves to their home products, in which they get more value for their money.

"There is a remedy for the Free Zone evils in a diplomatic way. Our State Department can cure the curse by proper negotiations with Mexico. I am one of those who believe that President Diaz, like his minister at Washington, Mr. Romero, is opposed to the Free Zone, and while he recently opened three ports for bonded traffic to that Zone which the United States had blocked, it was done at a time when the press of the country was renominating him for another Presidential term and he saw a double opportunity to please the frontier people and the railroads who had been asking that privilege, and at the same time his action was applauded by all Mexicans who believe in resisting any foreign interference in Mexican affairs. I am grounded in this belief from the fact that a gradual abolition of the Free Zone was intended by Mexico when 3 per cent duties were levied, and when that proportion was first increased to 5 per cent and then to 10 per cent.

"Of course the diplomatic proceedings must be kept entirely secret from the public, and in my opinion the manner of proceeding would be to have an understanding with Mexico that the question of the constitutionality of the law should be passed upon by the supreme court of that Republic just as the income tax law was treated by our courts. This is a sure remedy, and many Mexicans would aid to bring about this result. This would conceal any American interference and might prove satisfactory to all concerned.

"The Free Zone as it has resulted will be used by Mexico as a lever in diplomatic concessions from this Government. Its growth will make the lever all the more powerful, and serious complications may arise from its existence.

"If the facts I have placed before you merit your attention and consideration, I shall be pleased to serve you further.

"Yours, respectfully, JUAN S. HART."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this document shows clearly the condition that existed at the time that this act of 1895 was made the law, and shows the reasons for its passage. Since that time we have had no trouble at El Paso, comparatively speaking, in regard to smuggling goods from Mexico to our side of the river, and, as was predicted, great benefit has accrued to our merchants, because it stopped the shipment of goods in bond from New Orleans and Galveston, and from the Pacific coast to the Free Zone, and our merchants have been able to sustain themselves upon the American side. I now read a dispatch from El Paso, Tex., January 24, 1900:

MR. COOPER'S BILL IS NOT SATISFACTORY TO MERCHANTS OF EL PASO.

EL PASO, TEX., January 24, 1900.

The bill of Congressman COOPER of Texas in regard to the Mexican Free Zone, favorably reported by the Ways and Means Committee in the House to-day, is regarded by residents of this city as a blow aimed at the commercial interests of every town along the Mexican border.

The bill abolishing the law permitting the entry of European goods in bond through the United States into the Free Zone of Mexico was presented in Congress at the request of business men of El Paso, who were unable to compete with the merchants of Juarez, Mexico, who, by the aid of the United States, were able to procure goods from Europe free of duty and sell them at less than they cost American merchants.

El Paso business men are stirred up over the prospect of the Cooper bill being adopted.

At present goods for the Free Zone go into Mexico via Tampico and Vera Cruz and the high freight rates are a disadvantage.

This dispatch correctly states the objections to the repeal of the law of 1895.

Now, the question is, Will we give the American railroads the right to take these goods in bond and place them in the Free Zone to compete with our merchants upon this side, or will we pass the bill as reported originally from the Committee on Ways and Means? The committee's report on the bill states that the bill is unanimously reported. Why should we strike out part of this bill that has been thus favorably reported and substitute the Cooper resolution, which destroys the most vital part of the bill? Why this glaring inconsistency on the part of the committee?

It will be noted that the Secretary of the Treasury says in the memorandum that the passage of this bill will not endanger the revenue in any way.

This bill is exactly what we want. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] strikes out a part of this bill, the last clause in reference to the Free Zone, and substitutes the Cooper resolution, which repeals the law of 1895 and restores smuggling on the Mexican border.

The legislature of the State of Texas by a unanimous vote requested the passage of the law of 1895. Many of the members and two of the senators, Senator Dean, of El Paso, and Senator Atlee, of Laredo, were both members of that legislature and favored the passage of that law. These men are certainly familiar with the conditions in their own towns. We should not repeal the law of 1895; and I therefore hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] will be voted down.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to come to some arrangement about closing general debate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What time do you want?

Mr. PAYNE. What time do you wish?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire no further time.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask to close general debate now.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I desire to be heard for five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I would suggest to the gentleman that there would be time under the five-minute rule. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate be now closed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, I suppose the amendment is considered pending.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to occupy the attention of the committee much longer, but in view of what has been said by my colleague I deem it necessary to refer to some public documents myself.

The Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary Gage, in his letter of January 26, 1898, when this matter was up for consideration before the Fifty-fifth Congress, when asked for the views of the Treasury Department respecting the same, said:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter dated the 21st instant, from the clerk of your committee, with which was transmitted, for an expression of my views thereon, House joint resolution 27, providing for the repeal of the joint resolution in reference to the Free Zone.

On the 24 of February last, in reply to a letter from you, inclosing, for an expression of the views of this Department thereon, House joint resolution 222, which is substantially the same as that under consideration, you were advised that there is abundant opportunity for the perpetration of frauds on the revenue by reason of the Free Zone of Mexico, and until the privileges pertaining to said Zone are abolished by the Mexican Government the danger to the revenue will continue to exist.

The opinion was also expressed that the only practical result of the legislation which it is intended to repeal has been loss of business to American railway companies by reason of the diversion of the traffic to points in the Free Zone by way of Mexican seaports. The views then expressed are reiterated, and I see no objection to the passage of House resolution No. 27.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

HON. NELSON DINGLEY,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

That was with reference to the joint resolution providing for the repeal of the joint resolution in reference to the Free Zone passed in 1895. In a later letter he uses this language:

On March 1, 1895, a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the operation of section 3005, Revised Statutes, in so far as the same permits goods, wares, and merchandise to be transported in bond through the United States into the Free Zone of Mexico so long as said Zone exists, was approved, but the only apparent result of such resolution has been loss of business to American railway companies, by reason of the diversion of the traffic to places in the Free Zone by way of Mexican seaports.

In March, 1898, an investigation was made with the view to ascertaining the value of merchandise which passed through the United States to Mexico during the preceding year. As a result of the inquiries it was found that the total value of foreign merchandise passing in transit was $497,651, and in addition to that amount merchandise of the value of $191,774 was withdrawn from warehouse and exported to Mexico, making a total of $689,425, of which $211,589 was dutiable.

Then he enumerates features of the case there, and ends the letter by saying:

I am, however, of opinion that the joint resolution approved March 1, 1895, should be repealed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I simply want to cite Texas border city against Texas border city. My colleague, the gentleman from the Panhandle district, has had read resolutions passed by the merchants of El Paso. I now would like to have read, for the benefit of the House, resolutions passed by the Board of Trade of Eagle Pass, Tex., and with that I conclude my statement.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman how far he lives from any part of the boundary of Mexico?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. About 700 or 800 miles.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then you can not possibly have any interest in this question.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I have no personal interest in it at all, but I want the ports of Sabine Pass and Galveston and other ports to get the benefit of handling this traffic shipped to the Free Zone, and I want the railroads that run through America to get the benefit of hauling it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, I would ask the gentleman if he has ever been in the town of El Paso and knows anything of the conditions there personally?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I do not.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the committee recommended the passage of this bill unanimously?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. They did, and unanimously directed the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to favorably report this resolution and offer it as an amendment to the pending bill formerly reported by the committee, to which my colleague has referred.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why did they act so contradictorily, after having already reported a bill favorably, to authorize the gentleman to offer an amendment repealing the important part of the bill?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The contradiction is only an opinion of my colleague.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have already read in my time from the report of the committee where it says that they recommend that the bill be passed without amendment—that is, the bill 3334.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. They took subsequent action upon the resolution which I had introduced.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was not done at the same time?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. It was done at a subsequent meeting.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it true, as stated, that the Secretary of the Treasury recommended the passage of the bill 3334?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. It is true also that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter of March 11, 1898, in recommending the resolution, said:

> I am, however, of the opinion that the joint resolution approved March 1, 1895, should be repealed.

This amendment proposes to repeal the joint resolution of March 1, 1895.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can you explain the dilemma he has placed himself in by recommending this bill, which stands for the act of 1895, and, as you say, is in favor of this amendment?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. No inquiry was made at that time of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the Free Zone. He was asked about another bill—a bill to allow the ports of this country opened, so that goods could be entered and passed through all ports.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Clerk to read the newspaper paragraph I send to the Clerk's desk. These are resolutions passed by the Board of Trade of Eagle Pass.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE FREE ZONE—COOPER BILL INDORSED BY THE EAGLE PASS BOARD OF TRADE.

EAGLE PASS, TEX., January 30, 1900.

EDITOR EXPRESS: The undersigned committee, appointed by the board of trade of this city, begs leave to correct some mistakes made by some parties interviewed by the reporter of your paper in last Saturday's edition with reference to the pending Cooper bill, relating to the Free Zone in Mexico.

First. We beg to state that the so-called Free Zone extends from the Pacific in Lower California clear through to Brownsville and is 12 miles in width, not one-half mile, as your informer had it.

Second. The cost of transportation of goods from Tampico to Nuevo Laredo, C. Porfirio Diaz, and Juarez, opposite El Paso, is just as cheap by way of Tampico as by way of New Orleans and therefore does not increase the expense to such an amount as would make it equal to the customs tariff, as stated in your paper.

Third. It seems that there is a wrong idea existing regarding the transit of merchandise through the United States in bond to the Zona Libre, and in order to enlighten the public we beg leave to make the following statement:

Previous to the year 1895 all goods for the Free Zone in Mexico passed through the United States in bond and were a source of revenue not only to the American railroads and steamship companies but to many other interests, such as our labor, custom-house brokers, etc.

In said year some property holders and others in El Paso concluded that it would be beneficial to them and to their city if the Zona Libre were abolished, and instructed their representatives in the Texas legislature to pass a bill in said body requesting Congress to find ways and means for the abolishment of transporting goods in bond to the Free Zone. This end was accomplished, as Congress passed a law to that effect, but the same has never accomplished the purpose for which it was created, inasmuch as goods are passing to-day to the Zona Libre the same as formerly, but in another manner.

The Mexican merchants on the border soon found out that they could import goods from Europe for deposit in the American bonded warehouses on this border and then withdraw same for exportation to Mexico, which is done at present and since 1895. The only inconvenience in this last-mentioned manner is that the merchants making these importations have to give two bonds, one for importation and another for exportation, which is causing a few days' delay and a very small extra expense, but it will clearly be seen from this that the so-called law passed in 1895 has never answered the purpose it was created for, and only has taken away from the American railroads part of their transportation, as the Mexican Government in order to retaliate this enactment of Congress, has made it possible for Mexican merchants living in the Free Zone to import their goods by way of Tampico, which was not possible before said event took place.

The present Cooper bill before Congress now has for its purpose the repeal of this act of 1895, which will reopen the route of transportation in bond through this country to the Free Zone without entering goods in bonded warehouses and reexporting them; and the board of trade of this city, at a meeting held Saturday, January 27, has passed a resolution indorsing the Cooper bill in Congress, and has instructed its representatives at Washington to use their influence for the passage of said enactment.

Our experience has been that the Mexican Government is not ready at present to abolish the Zona Libre, and we see no reason why the United States should have any law on the statute books which had the result of deviating freight from our railroads to the Mexican lines. The abolishment of this law will not change the price or cost of any goods in the Free Zone, as has been intimated by your informant, as there is no increase of freight rates at present, nor will there be any decrease hereafter, should the Cooper bill pass, as goods pass through here now all the same, and the only effect it would have would be an increase of freight on our roads and the abolishment of entering goods on our frontier warehouses for exportation to Mexico, thereby doing away with a delay of a few days and a few dollars' expense.

Very respectfully,

M. L. OPPENHEIMER,
Chairman Committee Board of Trade, Eagle Pass, Tex.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I understand the pending question is on the amendment I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first section of the bill.

The Clerk read the bill and the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I call for a separate vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There will have to be a separate vote on the amendment, of course. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEPHENS of Texas) there were—ayes 56, noes 12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3334) to amend section 3005 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and had agreed to an amendment of the same, and as amended recommended that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reports that that committee has had under consideration House bill 3334, and reports the same back with an amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CUSHMAN, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. KNOX, for one week, on account of important business.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know whether a report has been made from Committee on Elections No. 1 to-day. I have been out of the Chamber.

The SPEAKER. No report has been made to-day.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the public building at Portland, Oreg., now occupied as a post-office and other Government offices, to be enlarged, so as to make the building suitable for the further accommodation of the post-office and the United States courts. Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2366) to authorize the establishment, at some point on Beaufort Harbor, North Carolina, of a station for the investigation of problems connected with marine fishery interests of the middle and south Atlantic coast.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Fisheries with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 7, after the word "point," to strike out "on Beaufort Harbor" and insert "in;" so as to make the section read:

That the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries be, and he is hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to establish a station for the investigation of problems connected with the marine fishery interests of the Middle and South Atlantic States at some point in North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 1, line 10, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-five thousand" and insert "twelve thousand five hundred;" so as to make the section read:

That for necessary surveys, erection of buildings and other structures, and for the proper equipment of said station, the sum of $12,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. COCKRELL. There will be no discussion, but I think a part of the report ought to be spread on the RECORD.

Mr. ALDRICH. The report is a very long one, and I must call for the regular order.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Fisheries, on the 8th instant.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the remainder of the report and letter of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries be printed in the RECORD, in order to show the justification of our action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report referred to is as follows:

The Committee on Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2366) for the establishment at Beaufort Harbor, North Carolina, of a station for the investigation of problems connected with the marine fishery interests of the Middle and Atlantic Coast States, have examined the same and submit the following report:

(1) The object of this station is the investigation of problems connected with the marine fishery interests of the Atlantic coast from Long Island to Florida, just as the stations already established on the New England coast (at Woods Hole), on the Pacific coast, and on the Great Lakes investigate similar problems for these regions.

(2) The annual value of the fishery interests of the States bordering the middle and south Atlantic coast (excluding New York on the north and Florida on the south) is about $16,000,000 for general fishery interests, and over $9,000,000 for the oyster interests alone. Certainly this industry is one deserving a fair amount of attention and investigation at the hands of the Government, and it is believed that such a careful investigation continued through a period of years may result in considerable increase in the extent of the industry.

(3) Among the problems it is proposed to have investigated at this station are: (a) Breeding times, places, and conditions, and the habits, food, and feeding grounds of the more important food-fishes of the middle and south Atlantic shore; and the enemies of these fishes, both during the earlier and later stages of their growth. (b) A thorough investigation as to the food, feeding and breeding habits, under different and varying conditions, of the oyster, clam, shrimp, and the edible crabs, and other marine forms which have an economic value either as food for man or as food for or enemies of other edible species. (c) A careful and thorough study of the general biological conditions which appear to be the most favorable for the growth and development of these and other useful and interesting marine forms. Mr. Alexander Agassiz, perhaps the ablest and most experienced naturalist in the country in connection with these matters, has well said that all such observations should be carried on year after year in connection with the regular work of a Government Fish Commission station, for the reason that they are not only germane to its investigations, but are essential to its full success.

(4) The special advantages offered by the North Carolina coast region for the location of such a station grow out of the fact that it is midway between where the more northern forms extending southward and the southern forms from Florida extending northward overlap in their distribution. And about these extensive North Carolina sounds there is an intermingling of fishes and other marine forms from all this middle and south Atlantic coast. Cape Hatteras, which was once supposed to form a dividing line between the northern and southern faunas, does not constitute such a division in any important sense in connection with the fishery interests, as these forms pass easily around the cape and enter the sounds freely at the several inlets both to the north and to the south of the cape. About Beaufort Harbor, where it is proposed to locate this station, the fauna of the open sea, that of the partially inclosed sounds (where both salt and brackish waters are found), and that of the neighboring fresh-water streams are brought into close proximity, and consequently we find there animal life in greater variety and in greater abundance than at any other point on the Atlantic. This fauna includes and furnishes food for a large variety of food fishes and other abundant economic forms, such as the oyster, clam, shrimp, crab, etc.

(5) The policy of maintaining a few Fish Commission stations at which ample opportunity is offered for such investigations has been fully justified by the history of the station on the New England coast at Woods Hole. The results of the purely voluntary (unpaid for) researches of the naturalists who have annually visited this station are of the highest value. In no way can the Fish Commission accumulate useful information concerning fishery interests and the general animal and plant life of a coast region so rapidly and at so little expense as by maintaining a well-equipped laboratory open to all who come to study the natural history of that region.

On the entire Atlantic coast south of New England there is no such laboratory at which the fauna may be investigated. This will doubtless continue to be the condition unless the Government cooperates in this work, since research laboratories open to the public are not established by private individuals or corporations. We can hardly expect any State to establish such a laboratory, for the reason that the larger problems to be solved relate to fishes which are migratory along the shores of a dozen or more States.

Our knowledge of the life history of the food-fishes and their food supplies and of the fauna of the middle and southern Atlantic coast is extremely meager, and yet it is sufficiently great for us to have learned its high economic value and its deep interest in connection with the great fishery problems of the country.

We submit herewith a letter from the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries recommending the passage of the bill, with certain amendments:

UNITED STATES COMMISSION OF FISH AND FISHERIES,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1900.

DEAR SIR: Respectfully referring to the bill (S. 2366) introduced by Senator BUTLER providing for the establishment of a station in North Carolina for the investigation of marine biological problems, I desire to state that this bill is heartily approved by the commission, and is also indorsed by the leading educational institutions in the country, including Johns Hopkins University, and practically all the universities in the Southern States.

In the title of the bill, the commission recommends that the words "on Beaufort Harbor" be stricken out and the word "in" inserted, and that the same change be made in the last line of the first section of the bill. It will facilitate the acquisition of a site and prove beneficial in various other ways if the commission is not expressly restricted to one particular place, although the locality mentioned in the bill undoubtedly affords the best facilities and would undoubtedly be selected.

Although $25,000 would not be too large a sum for Congress to appropriate for a station of this character, yet, in view of the comparatively cheap rates at which materials and labor can be had and the small outlay probably required for the necessary land, the commission believes that a plain, substantial, and satisfactory station may be established for a smaller sum than is carried by the bill, and recommends that $12,500 be appropriated.

In the event of the passage of this bill, it would not be the intention of the commission to ask Congress to provide a large permanent personnel for this station, as it is the established policy to have the work at such stations done by a corps of volunteer assistants from the various institutions of learning. All that would be required would be one or two laborers.

Very respectfully,

GEO. M. BOWERS, Commissioner.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Chairman Committee on Fisheries, United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I did not hear the bill read. I should like to inquire whether this bureau, or whatever it may be called, when established, is to be independent of the Fish Commission or is to act under it?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is to be a part and parcel of the Fish Commission, like Woods Hole.

Mr. BUTLER. It is to be a part of the Commission, like Woods Hole, in Massachusetts.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is that provided for in the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. BUTLER. It is.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the establishment at some point in North Carolina of a station for the investigation of problems connected with marine fishery interests of the middle and south Atlantic coast."

LIGHTS ON STEAM PILOT VESSELS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives, and calls the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] to it.

The bill (H. R. 5288) relating to lights on steam pilot vessels was read the first time by its title.

Mr. HANNA. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this House bill, the Senate having, within a day or two, passed one identical with it. The bill will be read at length for information.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a steam pilot vessel, when engaged on her station on pilotage duty and in waters of the United States, and not at anchor, shall, in addition to the lights required for all pilot boats, carry at a distance of 8 feet below her white masthead light a red light, visible all around the horizon and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere at a distance of at least 2 miles, and also the colored side lights required to be carried by vessels when under way.

When engaged on her station on pilotage duty and in waters of the United States, and at anchor, she shall carry, in addition to the lights required for all pilot boats, the red light above mentioned, but not the colored side lights.

When not engaged on her station on pilotage duty, she shall carry the same lights as other steam vessels.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be construed as supplementary to article 8 of the act approved June 7, 1897, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States," and to article 8 of an act approved August 19, 1890, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions at sea."

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect on June 30, 1900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 732, relating to lights on steam pilot vessels, which has been returned from the House at the request of the Senate, will be indefinitely postponed.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to discuss as closely as I can the provisions of the bill reported from the Committee on Finance. I do not know that this is necessary, at this stage of the debate, after the clear statement made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. ALDRICH] and after the admirable statement of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] yesterday. In this discussion I do not intend, if I can avoid it, entering into the various phases of the financial question that have been the subject of debate in this Chamber for twenty-five years and also the topic of debate throughout the country.

The question of the currency of our country and what it shall permanently be has been more or less discussed for the last three or four years in public platforms and in the two Houses of Congress. Many reports have been made in the other House from committees having charge of the subject, but, so far as I know, during all those discussions and after all those reports no vote has been taken for three or four years in the House of Representatives upon the various subjects relating to the currency.

In 1897, immediately after the inauguration of President McKinley, and perhaps during the winter prior to that inauguration, it was proposed in the other House to take up the whole subject of our currency and deal with it by and large, and different measures were proposed for a radical modification of our present system of currency. These measures were not pressed for full consideration and to a vote in the House for reasons which were obvious, namely, that any provision or any bill on this subject meeting the views of a majority there when presented here it would straightway be subjected to an amendment providing "for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 without the aid or consent of any other nation." If I have quoted that phraseology correctly, this was the position of a majority of the Senate during the last Congress and since 1894.

It was well understood by all those who favor sound money and a stable or a reasonably stable measure of value and a stable currency that there were modifications necessary in our existing laws to maintain both. So the two Houses have at this session undertaken to consider this general question without entering into the large and complicated questions that were considered prior to the present Congress in the various committees of the House of Representatives. So this bill comes here from the House of Representatives, professedly, at least, taking care only of our present currency and our present standard of money.

There is no proposition, so far as I know, maintained in the debates upon this question to change our existing currency, consisting, as it does now, of gold and silver and gold certificates and silver certificates, based upon deposits, and what are known as greenbacks and Treasury notes and national-bank notes. Therefore the comprehensive system that has been at various times proposed does not find, so far as I can judge, a lodgment in the bill that comes to us from the House of Representatives, and it certainly is not provided for in the Senate amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator has twice or three times referred to a comprehensive system of currency. Will he tell us what he means by that?

Mr. ALLISON. I should be very glad to do that if time would permit; but it is rather too long and complicated a task for me to answer fully in the brief time I have. I will say, however, to the Senator that there are those who favor the free and unlimited coinage of silver. That is one of them. There are those who believe that that would be disastrous to the country, and that we should not only have the gold standard, but that we should also retire Government notes, consisting of our greenback currency and our Treasury notes, and that we should also in some comprehensive way deal with the silver money of our country. That, in brief, I understand to be the project that has been developed and discussed in Congress and in various portions of the country. Now, I do not care to go into those questions in detail.

Mr. TELLER. If I understand the Senator, he does not mean to touch those questions at all. I understood the Senator to say the other day that the House bill dealt with that matter. Does not the Senator mean to touch the House bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I mean to touch the whole question so far as I can, if my good friend will have patience, as I know he always has.

This bill comes to us from the House making certain provisions for the greenback currency, the Treasury notes, and the silver dollars. Those provisions have not been assented to by the Senate Committee on Finance, and they do not recommend their adoption.

The first section of the House bill is substantially the first section of the Senate bill, except that the Senate amendment in its first section provides for certain things that are undertaken to be provided for or at least dealt with in other sections of the House bill. We believe, at least the committee believe, so far as I know, that it is wiser and better for us to deal with the details of this question as proposed by the Senate amendment, rather than adopt the provisions of the second, third, and fourth sections of the House bill. The House bill, in its second section, provides for the payment of all obligations of the Government, public and private, in accordance with the standard provided for by the first section, providing specifically for the interest-bearing and noninterest-bearing debt, making them payable in gold coin. I shall not enter into an analysis of the second, third, and fourth sections of the House bill, at least not until the sense of the Senate shall have been taken upon the Senate amendment.

The first section of the Senate bill is divided practically into three parts. I wish to read it. The first portion of the section provides:

> That the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine shall, as established by section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, continue to be the standard unit of value.

The next proposition is:

> And all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard.

Then follows this provision:

> And United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, when presented to the Treasury for redemption shall be redeemed in gold coin of such standard.

The first question to be considered—and this question applies equally to the House bill as to the Senate bill—is whether or not this is a correct recital of the law as it has stood upon our statute books since 1873. I did not suppose until this debate began that there could be any doubt upon what our money standard is; but it has been argued on this floor by Senators on the other side of the Chamber that we have not been, or at least that we are not now, upon the gold standard of money. So it does become necessary for us to inquire into that question briefly.

The standard of metallic money is that which is described as of a certain weight and a certain fineness, and which has the opportunity of being coined at the mints of the United States at the request of private holders.

Section 3511 of the Revised Statutes—which I shall not stop to read—is taken from the statute of 1873, which declared in specific terms that the unit of value should be a dollar, and that it should consist of 25.8 grains of standard gold—standard gold being nine-tenths fine—and should contain 23.22 grains of pure gold.

Mr. TELLER. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I want to ask him if he assumes that because in 1873 the gold dollar was made the unit of value, that that put us upon the gold standard?

Mr. ALLISON. The dollar was made the unit of value, as it always had been prior to that time, and the dollar was required by this statute to consist of 23.22 grains of pure gold, or 25.8 grains of standard gold.

Mr. TELLER. Then I ask the Senator another question, because I want to get at his position on this question. I ask him were we on the silver standard from 1792 to 1873?

Mr. ALLISON. We were not.

Mr. TELLER. Then I will ask the Senator before he gets through to show the difference between the unit of 1792 and the unit of 1873.

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer that. The unit was the same, the dollar.

Mr. TELLER. I mean the words making the difference in effect.

Mr. ALLISON. The standard of value of 1792 is not proclaimed in the statute of 1792. There were two kinds of dollars to be coined under that statute, one of silver and one of gold, and by the eleventh section of the statute of 1792—if I do not mistake the section—it was provided that these two coins, one of silver and one of gold, should hold the relation to each other of 15 ounces troy of silver to 1 ounce troy of gold. Therefore, we had what was then known and what I will denominate for convenience—Senators will perfectly understand it—the double or alternative standard of silver and gold under the act of 1792, under the equivalence of 15 to 1 in weight of the metals respectively.

Mr. TELLER. I must correct the Senator, if he will allow me. There was no gold dollar provided for by the act of 1792.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not. The Senator does not wish to stick in the bark?

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no; I do not.

Mr. ALLISON. The dollar was made the unit; 10 units made an eagle and 5 units made a half eagle, and therefore the unit was a dollar; but the value of the two coins was designated by the statute, saying that one should contain so many grains of gold and that the other should contain so many grains of silver.

Those who recommended these coins and reported their recommendation to the two Houses for their adoption knew this perfectly well, and intended that we should have these two coins in circulation, traveling side by side. In order to accomplish this, they spent months and years in ascertaining what was the true commercial value in the markets of the world of these two metals separately, and then they embedded them in the statutes according to their commercial value; and so we had these two moneys in our statutes in 1792, not having either the silver or the gold standard exclusively, but both on the ratio fixed.

Mr. President, when we come to the act of 1873 we find, as I have quoted, that this dollar, this unit of value, should be composed of what? Of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine; and that the silver dollar, which was found in the act of 1792, was no longer found in the act of 1873, but was dropped from coinage, and no longer open to coinage at the mints of the United States. There was substituted for it in the coinage another dollar, of 420 grains of standard silver, which was made a limited legal tender to the amount of $5, although there was no limit to its coinage.

So, Mr. President, I take it that there can be no question that the act of 1873 provided for the single standard of gold; and if there were any question about it, I think I could bring at least 10,000 pages of the RECORD containing arguments made on various sides in this Chamber to prove that that was the effect of the statute.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I have not disputed that proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand.

Mr. TELLER. I disputed the proposition that making the unit of gold put us on the gold standard. We went to the gold standard in 1873 because you denied to silver the right to be coined at the mints, and not because of the unit.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not because of the unit. I certainly know better than to suppose that fixing the unit of value would put us upon any standard. The unit of value is the dollar. The measure of value is the thing to be contained and constituting the dollar, and we provided in 1873 that it should be 25.8 grains gold.

Mr. TELLER. I want to answer the Senator that it is not the measure of value. You had two dollars provided for; you had a gold dollar and a silver dollar, and you denied to the silver dollar the power you gave to the gold dollar. That is what put us on the gold standard.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. It was impossible after 1873 for the owner of silver bullion to carry it to the mints and have it coined into dollars of 412½ grains, as the law provided before that time. Therefore the law of 1792, which was modified afterwards, was the only law under which the owner of silver bullion could carry it to the mints; but bullion is not carried to the mints in either silver or gold without the authority of statute. Prior to 1873 the mints of the United States were open to the free coinage of silver, but the statute of 1873 provided that they should be no longer open, and that placed us, as some of my friends here would say, ex proprio vigore upon the gold standard.

Then we were put upon the gold standard in 1873; but the Senators on the other side of the Chamber have argued here that, because of subsequent legislation, this provision has been in some way modified or changed, and the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], whom I am sorry not to see in his seat, has discovered that because in 1890 we dropped the gold dollar from our coinage, therefore we abandoned the gold standard, and that gold is no longer standard money. That is the most ingenious suggestion I have heard from the other side of the Chamber on that subject; but the Senator seems to have forgotten that it is not necessary that we should fabricate coins of the unit of the standard. No country does that; at least I do not know of any country that does it.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, yes; a good many do it.

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps so, but the pound sterling is the unit of value in Great Britain, and they do not coin the pound sterling there.

Mr. TELLER. They coin the sovereign.

Mr. ALLISON. They coin the sovereign. The single franc piece is the unit of value in France, and yet there has never been a gold franc coined in France. The mark, of 24 cents in value, is the unit of value in Germany, the standard of accounts, and yet no gold mark has ever been coined in Germany. So the fact that we do not coin the unit of value does not affect the measure or value or the standard of money or in any way affect the standard.

Mr. President, I do not wish to go over the statutes—we have had three or four of them on this subject—which have been quoted here as indicating that we have since 1873 changed our standard; notably, that was claimed for the statute of 1878. I have that statute here, and I want to call attention to it for a moment.

What does the statute of 1878 provide as to silver coinage? These words were carefully chosen in that statute to effectuate the purpose intended. Let me read them:

> That there shall be coined, at the several mints of the United States, silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy of standard silver.

That did not mean a standard of value; that meant a standard of fineness, as is shown by the phraseology of the statute, that the silver dollar should be 412½ grains of silver of the standard of fineness, which was nine-tenths. Otherwise, if that language had not been in the statute, 412½ grains of silver might have been coined with eight-tenths of pure silver and two-tenths of alloy, or any other quantity of alloy which might be chosen. Therefore, when these standard silver dollars were coined in 1878 they were standard dollars of the fineness of nine-tenths, and nothing else. But the very idea of making silver a standard money at that time is excluded in every line and every sentence of that statute. It provides that the Government of the United States shall buy silver, and that it shall coin it into silver dollars nine-tenths fine, and put the seigniorage into the Treasury of the United States.

It provides also in another section that there shall be a commission appointed to deal with other nations as to the establishment of a fixity of value between gold and silver as money. So that there is nothing in this statute which can be construed as making the dollar of silver a standard of value. Each of the other statutes following—the statute of 1890 and the statute of 1893—is in accord with that statute as affecting the standard of value. Even the statute of 1875, which was the first statute passed after our new standard of money was created, eliminated the idea practically of having silver as a part of our standard money, because it provided for the purchase of a certain quantity of silver which should be fabricated into fractional coin. So there is no statute which in any way changes the statute of 1873.

If any further proof of this were needed, I might say that until within a very few months I have never heard it contended that the statute of 1873 did not place us upon the gold standard of money. Certainly all the debates which have occurred in this Chamber have assumed that to be true during all these twenty-one years, and if they did not assume it to be true, it would be a fact nevertheless, because since 1879, on the 1st day of January, there has not been bought a bale of cotton, a bushel of wheat, a coat, a necktie, or a breakfast, that has not been paid for on the standard of 25.8 grains of gold as constituting the dollar measuring values.

There has not been one dollar during all that period of twenty-one years that has not at this standard passed current everywhere, in every part of the United States, without discount; and although sometimes in panic periods they may be at a premium, every dollar that has ever been in circulation since January 1, 1879, in the United States, whether of silver or of gold or of paper based upon either gold or silver, or of national-bank notes, has been on an absolute parity with gold coin of the standard fineness described in the act of 1873.

So, Mr. President, when we adopt practically the phraseology of the act of 1873 we are reiterating, I agree, the existing law. It is but a reaffirmation of what has been the law since 1873. But I will pass from that phase of this first section.

The next clause on which I wish to comment, and which I have already read, provides:

> And all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard.

That is, in effect, new legislation, although it is what would be the result if that provision was not found in the statute. We resumed specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879, in gold. The money that was gathered to enable us to resume specie payments was gold money. The Secretary of the Treasury sold a large amount of bonds—we are all familiar with the transaction—for that purpose, and placed the proceeds, in gold, in the Treasury, intended to be reserved for the redemption of the greenbacks in gold. In 1878, when the silver dollar was impressed into circulation by that statute, we provided that these dollars should be coined in limited quantities and on Government account.

What was that for? Senators know the contest we had here in 1878. There was a contest between the adherents of free silver, who favored the free and unlimited coinage of silver in 1878, when silver was 9 per cent below par. I was one of those who believed then that if we could not keep our silver when it was 1 and 2 per cent above par, or when it was 2 or 3 per cent above par, and the dearer metal, we could not keep our gold here when silver was the depreciated metal to the extent of 8 or 9 per cent, and it was unwise for us to open our mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, with the disparagement of 9 per cent against silver because of this depreciation, and that to have done so would have placed us inevitably upon the silver standard, although the variation or dislocation as compared with more recent times was only about 9 per cent against 50 per cent now.

That was debated here; and therefore the very provisions of the act of 1878 impliedly required that we should keep our money, whatever it might be, whether of paper or of silver, at a parity with our standard money. And that was not only provided for in this way in that statute, but before the repeal of that act of 1878 there was coined $378,000,000, and $78,000,000 were covered into the Treasury as seigniorage or profit.

Therefore it would be a want of faith and a failure to maintain the credit of the United States if we had not kept and do not keep those dollars at a parity with our standard. If I were to give my note or issue an obligation for any sum of money and use the proceeds, and then should go to the holder of that note ten days or ten years after, having the ability to pay it in full, having the ability to maintain my credit and my honor, and say, "I will give you 80 per cent only or 50 per cent of that money," I would be justly branded as dishonest; and certainly a government can afford to act in as good faith with its creditors and with the holders of money coined by it as a private debtor can afford to act with his creditor.

So it is, Mr. President, that if there was no provision whatever here that we should maintain all forms of money at a parity, we should be bound in honor to do it as a nation. But we have twice, at least, in our statutes provided that this shall be done. It is true we have not so provided in the form in which we propose to enact this provision. In the act of 1890—which was, of course, a great mistake, as shown by subsequent experience; I agree to that now and I thought so then—there was a provision—

> That upon demand of the holder of any of the Treasury notes herein provided for the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin, at his discretion, it being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law.

That was a declaration of policy, of course, and was not in the form of a statute; but it was a public declaration of a public policy in a statute that should bind the conscience of the Government and the conscience of the Secretary of the Treasury, whose duty it is in the administration of these laws to maintain this declared policy.

So the act of 1893, which has been quoted here by Senators, reads:

> And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts.

So that twice in our statutes we have reaffirmed the policy of maintaining the parity of these coins. Now we propose to transform that declared public policy into an actual statute, binding upon those whose duty it is to administer the law.

The next provision is one which requires the redemption of the United States notes and the Treasury notes in gold. That may be stated to be a strengthening and invigoration of the existing law, although, so far as I know, there has never been a greenback or a Treasury note redeemed otherwise than in gold. There has never been, so far as I know, a single dollar borrowed for the purpose of redeeming the greenbacks that has not been paid into the Treasury in gold. Therefore there is a moral obligation to pay these notes in gold. I do not even know whether the question can be raised that the notes are payable in coin. I do not think there is any provision for it.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; the act of 1875. Will the Senator allow me to read it to him?

Mr. ALLISON. I have it here.

Mr. TELLER. Then the Senator takes back what he said?

Mr. ALLISON. I will not take back what I said as respects the moral obligation to redeem them in gold.

Mr. TELLER. The greenbacks were made specifically redeemable in coin by the act of 1875.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; and by the act of 1869 they were impliedly redeemable in gold and silver.

Mr. TELLER. Not at all.

Mr. ALLISON. In the act of 1869, strengthening the public credit, long before the act of 1875 was thought of, when silver was a standard of value, it was provided that those bonds should not be paid until the greenbacks themselves should be redeemed in gold and silver coin. I am perfectly familiar with those statutes.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator ought to be.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to say to my friend that if these notes are redeemable in coin, this bill changes the law so as to make them redeemable in gold. They have been redeemable in gold in practice. It is essential, if they are to continue in circulation, that all the people may know that we intend to redeem them in gold, according to the standard of 1873 because at least this substitute does not provide for the elimination of the greenbacks from our currency, but directs that they shall continue as a part of our currency.

If they are to continue as a part of our currency, there ought to be a reserve for their redemption, and that reserve should be, as it always has been since 1879, in gold and ample to secure the redemption in gold. So there is not a provision in the first section of the Senate substitute which is not now a part of the law or which has not been the practice of the Government since 1879 and that has not been declared by statute as the policy of the Government.

Mr. President, having said this much respecting the first section, I wish to say, regarding the second section, that it is intended to provide means whereby this gold reserve, which is set apart also by the second section, shall be constantly replenished after the greenbacks are redeemed. It may seem at first that this gold-redemption fund of a hundred and fifty million dollars is too large. It is larger than is necessary at this moment, I agree.

I looked over the redemptions of greenbacks yesterday and found that there were $30,000 redeemed on that day and $2,000 of Treasury notes. If the greenbacks—and I use that word in its ordinary, common sense—if the United States notes are to continue in circulation, they become a part of the basis of the credit of our country, and they should be absolutely redeemable hereafter, as they have been heretofore, in gold coin, and if they are so redeemed the reserve which is here provided for them and for the Treasury notes will be so complete that there will be no danger of any run or panic as respects their convertibility at any time into gold coin.

Mr. President, we have had a little experience on this question in the past. We had an experience in regard to it in 1893. I dislike to go into that discussion or even into an extended allusion to the situation of 1893 and the years that followed to 1896. It is sufficient for us to know that during that time the gold reserve was depleted from $100,000,000 to $41,000,000 at one time, speaking in round numbers, or perhaps $42,000,000, and at another time to $60,000,000, and it was feared by those who held greenbacks that the Government of the United States would not be able to redeem them in gold, and that when that ceased we would practically be upon the silver standard of money.

Whether we should or not I shall not now discuss, but there was a period of alarm that ran through nearly two years of time. That period of alarm came first in 1893, from the belief in many minds that we were likely to have, first, silver legislation, and, second, unfavorable tariff legislation. Of course the fear of silver legislation was soon abandoned, because it became patent very early that the President of the United States would not consent to the silver legislation proposed by his party or a portion of it.

But the disturbance, the unrest, the long debate of 1893 respecting the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law made the country uneasy. The people did not know whether that act was to be repealed or not. The vote in this Chamber was pivotal for more than four months, although this body was then Democratic, as was the other House, and the President had been elected by the Democratic party. There was, as I say, doubt and unrest as regards the money situation during the year 1893, or at least up to nearly the end of that year.

This was not without justification, because if the purchasing clause of the Sherman law was in force to-day, instead of having, as we have now, about $500,000,000 in silver, we would have practically more than twelve hundred millions, and we should be upon the silver standard. But I do not care to go into that phase of the question. However, that occasioned disturbance in the country and a feeling of unrest during the whole of 1893.

When it was discovered in 1894 that the great body of the Democratic party intended to abandon their President and intended to stand upon the proposition of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1, the country became alarmed, believing that there was danger at least that that policy would be approved in this country at the coming elections.

Hence it was that the President of the United States was obliged to borrow money from time to time in order to maintain this reserve. In my judgment he would not have been obliged to do this had it not been also for the fact that during this whole time our revenues were insufficient to meet our expenditures, and a large portion of the money actually borrowed was used to pay the current expenses of the Government. It was because those then in power, in the readjustment of taxation, so readjusted our tax system, internal and external, that the revenues fell far short of meeting the current expenditures, and money which was poured into the Treasury and ostensibly went into the gold reserve was immediately taken out for the purpose of paying the current expenditures of the Government.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if that was not contrary to law? Had the President the authority to issue bonds from which to obtain money on which to run the Government and pay its current expenses?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not care to go into that question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have the Senator's opinion on that point if he is willing to give it.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator to ask it, but I said I did not care to go into that question. I have no doubt the President had power to borrow money to maintain the——

Mr. TILLMAN. The parity.

Mr. ALLISON. To maintain the resumption of specie payments.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say to maintain the parity.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not say to maintain the parity. I say to maintain the reserve for the redemption of greenbacks. He had power to do that, because the law of 1875 gave it to him, although it was disputed somewhat at the time, but I believe no one disputes it now.

The Secretary of the Treasury having this money in the Treasury and in the reserve, redeeming the greenbacks with the reserve, he of course replenished the general fund in the Treasury, and held that, having money in the Treasury, if a warrant came there he was bound to pay it rather than to let it go to protest.

Mr. TILLMAN. In other words——

Mr. ALLISON. I leave that question to the Senator from South Carolina to decide for himself. I hope it will never occur again, and it never can occur if these provisions which we now propose to embody into our statutes become law. We will stop all that opportunity which the Senator apparently, although he has asked me for information, condemns.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator again allow me to ask him a question, and that is, whether he did not sustain the then President of the United States, a so-called Democrat, in that policy?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know precisely what the Senator means by sustaining the President. I certainly did not in any way criticise the borrowing of money.

Mr. TILLMAN. Did he not have the hearty approval of the Senator from Iowa in selling bonds to get money with which to maintain the gold reserve and turn around and use that money to run the Government, contrary to law?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from South Carolina had better segregate his questions a little. He asks too many in a single sentence. I did sustain the President of the United States in borrowing money to maintain the reserve. I probably did criticise him and his party and the majority in this Chamber which refused to provide other means whereby the current expenditures of the Government could be paid, and thus forced the Secretary of the Treasury either to allow the Government obligations to go to protest or to use those funds.

The Senator from South Carolina was not perhaps in this Chamber when on an appropriation bill in 1893, less than six weeks before President Cleveland was inaugurated, we put on an appropriation bill, with the unanimous approval of the Committee on Appropriations, of which I was then chairman, a provision which came into this Chamber and which passed here without the yeas and the nays being called, and practically without debate, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue $50,000,000 of Treasury certificates of indebtedness, payable in two years, drawing 3 per cent interest, to meet any deficiencies in the public expenditures. We saw that those deficiencies were coming.

You forget now that when Mr. Cleveland was elected in 1892 there at once fell upon this country a pall and gloom, because it was believed that he would carry out his determined purpose of overturning the industrial system of our country and revolutionizing it into a system of free trade; and it did not require a man of large experience to see that if that was to eventuate, there would be a large deficit in the Treasury consequent upon the change of policy. Therefore we prepared for it, or sought to prepare for it; and when the measure went to the House of Representatives, that body refused, and made it a condition with us either of allowing the sundry civil bill to fail or to eliminate that provision for $50,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I merely interject these remarks into his speech in order to get him, if he will, to absolve the Democratic party from any responsibility for Grover Cleveland or his errors. He never was a Democrat, and we deny it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will absolve the Democratic party from any responsibility for him during the last years of his Administration, and I will absolve him from any responsibility for the Democratic party as well. [Laughter.] Certainly he does not want any responsibility of that character.

Mr. TILLMAN. I tried to get the Senator from Iowa to acknowledge that he indorsed and approved the action of the President at that time, but the Senator would not do it.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, I knew what the Senator from South Carolina was trying to do. There was no question about what he wanted. I did not intend to discuss this question; but when the tariff bill, so called, came in—because it came in with the deficit staring us in the face—the deficit of the first full year of his Administration was $70,000,000. It came in and it passed the other House and it passed this body.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, will he not also enlighten us whether President Harrison in the closing months of his Administration did not have bonds prepared, looking to this very thing?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that, but I know that it would have been a prudent thing for any Administration to look into the face of the fact which we here in the Senate looked into, that the advent of the Democratic party in 1893 was the signal for deficiencies and disasters and distress and revolution as respect our industrial system. Therefore, if President Harrison did not see it he must have been asleep. [Laughter.]

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. What was the surplus of the last year of the Republican Administration?

Mr. ALLISON. The surplus?

Mr. TELLER. Yes; the surplus.

Mr. ALLISON. The surplus——

Mr. TILLMAN. Under your own tariff; under the McKinley tariff act.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I see that the Senator and I are at a divergence at once. Under the McKinley tariff, the moment it was proclaimed that President Cleveland was elected that moment the receipts under that tariff began to fall, and therefore it was that when the 4th of March came, there being an interval of three months between election and inauguration, there was a falling off in revenue; and when President Cleveland came into office in 1893 the surplus in the Treasury was $124,000,000.

Mr. TELLER. When?

Mr. ALLISON. On the 1st day of March, as shown by the public statement. It was a hundred and twenty-four million dollars. I have the statement here.

Mr. TELLER. The 1st of March of what year?

Mr. ALLISON. Eighteen hundred and ninety-three.

Mr. TELLER. Oh.

Mr. ALLISON. Eighteen hundred and ninety-three. I did not know but that somebody might think that an important question, so I have the information here. It covers the period to the 1st day of March. This is the usual statement which comes monthly.

Mr. TELLER. That is not the revenue.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not speaking of revenue.

Mr. TELLER. That is not the revenue. I am not asking the Senator anything about the money in the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator asked me——

Mr. TELLER. The Senator has not answered my question. I asked him, and I want to repeat it, what was the surplus revenue for the year ending June 30 before the election of Mr. Cleveland? Now, let the Senator answer that.

Mr. TILLMAN. The receipts above the expenditures; not the money in the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. When was that?

Mr. TELLER. When was Mr. Cleveland elected?

Mr. ALLISON. What time—the 31st of July or the 1st of July?

Mr. TELLER. The 30th of June, the close of the fiscal year, before Mr. Cleveland was elected, when nobody knew whether he would be elected or not, and when the Senator was shouting with myself and others that we were going to defeat him.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly. I have that before me also.

Mr. TELLER. What was it?

Mr. ALLISON. The deficiency was $27,000,000.

Mr. BERRY. Deficiency?

Mr. ALLISON. Deficiency.

Mr. TILLMAN. That was under the McKinley Act?

Mr. ALLISON. Under the McKinley Act.

Mr. TILLMAN. Therefore the Wilson-Gorman Act did not bring on all this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCOMAS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not in the manner in which he presents himself. If he asks me to yield or asks me a question, I shall be happy to yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am sorry I have intruded upon the Senator. I certainly intended no discourtesy.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not. I know the Senator did not.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator spoke about my manner, as though it had been offensive.

Mr. ALLISON. It has been the very reverse.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina did not address the Chair and ask permission to interrupt the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator from Iowa has the wrong figures. I think there was a slight surplus.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. A surplus of two millions.

Mr. ALLISON. Did I say a deficiency?

Mr. TELLER. Yes. There was a slight surplus that year, amounting to a trifle; but if the appropriations had been expended that we had already made there would have been a deficiency.

Mr. ALLISON. There was surplus revenue——

Mr. TELLER. That was before Mr. Cleveland was elected. I am not defending Mr. Cleveland.

Mr. ALLISON. I know that.

Mr. TELLER. I have as poor an opinion of him as the Senator has a good one.

Mr. ALLISON. There was not a surplus on the 1st of July, 1892. Did the Senator ask me about the 30th of June before the election?

Mr. TELLER. Eighteen hundred and ninety-two?

Mr. ALLISON. That would be 1892. There was an excess of revenue over expenditures on the 1st of July, 1892, of $9,000,000.

Mr. TELLER. That is it.

Mr. ALLISON. I inadvertently quoted the wrong figures a moment ago. It was $9,914,000.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to call his attention to the fact that that was under the McKinley tariff and under a Republican Administration, and therefore his contention that the Wilson-Gorman tariff and the Democratic mismanagement were responsible for the lack of ability on the part of the United States to meet its current expenses is not tenable.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not making any statement with respect to the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill except the one statement that the revenues failed to meet the expenditures. It may not have been the fault of those who created the revenues. It may have been the fault of those who made the expenditures and those who made the appropriations.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Republican party made the expenditures.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator does not seem to reach the point I am trying to get at, which is that the bonds which were sold in 1894, 1895, and 1896 were sold in the face of a deficit of revenue, and therefore their proceeds, after getting into the Treasury, were used in the payment of current expenses.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is too fair a man not to acknowledge that the facts have proved that that deficit in the Treasury did not come from Democratic policies, even though he may charge Grover Cleveland and the Wilson-Gorman tariff to the Democratic party, but it was a condition of the country.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly I am not at this time criticising parties, but I am trying to show that money borrowed was used to pay expenses as well as to maintain the reserve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to those observations which the Senator has just made. They would be pertinent if true. [Laughter.] But the Senator from South Carolina does not seem to gather the scope of this situation. The first thing that appeared was the distress and the hard times, and the next thing that appeared was the Democratic tariff, and the next thing that appeared was the fear that we were going to the silver standard; and all these things did surprise timid people, people who had small earnings, and caused them to go where those earnings were deposited and seek to get them in the form of money.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one other question? He has the figures before him, so that it will not disturb him, and he is familiar with these matters. Will the Senator now tell us what was the condition of the surplus or the deficiency on the last day of June, 1893, for that fiscal year?

Mr. ALLISON. I will.

Mr. TELLER. When the Democratic Administration had been in power three months.

Mr. ALLISON. It had been in power from the 4th of March to the 1st of July. The excess of revenue was $2,341,000.

Mr. TELLER. That is for the fiscal year?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; for the fiscal year. It is the excess of revenue over expenditures.

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. On the 1st of July, 1893, it was $2,341,000. Of course the old tariff was still in effect.

Mr. LODGE. We were still under the McKinley tariff.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Cleveland had been elected——

Mr. SPOONER. In November, pledged to its repeal.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Cleveland had been elected in November, and of course the law was in operation and the revenues up to that time were still large.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator give us the deficiency in 1894? Let us have the whole thing together.

Mr. ALLISON. I will give it for 1894.

Mr. TILLMAN. That was after the Wilson Act went into effect.

Mr. ALLISON. The deficiency was $70,000,000.

I wish to state that the raid, if I may use that word—and it is familiar to Senators—on the Treasury for the redemption of greenbacks resulted from the distrust which came in turn from the divisions in the Democratic party. The great body of them were on one side and Mr. Cleveland and a few of his followers were on the other, and that division disclosed the fact that in the elections that were to come the shibboleth of the campaign on that side would be the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

So up to the year 1896 and during the years 1895 and 1896 there was want of confidence, an essential element in the establishment and maintenance of credit. There was want of confidence in the credit of our country and the desire of its people to maintain that credit. I am not making charges against one side or the other, but I assert that the political questions that were thrust into prominence in connection with our currency system in 1893 and 1895 and 1896 were largely responsible for the deficit in our Treasury and for the uncertainty as respects our money, and therefore there were constant redemptions of greenbacks at the Treasury.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator care to express an opinion as to whether that deficit was owing more to the distrust in regard to the currency and the free coinage of silver and the policy of the Democratic party than to the tariff?

Mr. ALLISON. Well, Mr. President, I shall not try to split hairs and divide with the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. It certainly must have been one or the other.

Mr. ALLISON. It was both of them. My friend wholly misapprehends me if he thinks that I hold the change of the tariff harmless.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood the Senator to give it as his opinion that it was owing more largely to the distrust in regard to the financial condition than it was to the tariff; that the tariff cut very little figure.

Mr. ALLISON. On that point I will allow the Senator to make the proper division between those two great causes for the distrust.

Mr. President, there is a singular thing that ought to be stated in this connection, and perhaps it ought to be said somewhat in defense of the other side of the Chamber. When they left the Administration, or went out of power in 1897, they left a pretty large surplus, it being chiefly the remaining surplus over the amount of money borrowed and the amount paid out to meet deficiencies in the revenue. They did not take any of it; they held it all in the Treasury. Therefore, whatever money they borrowed that was not paid out for expenses was still in the Treasury when President Cleveland left office and President McKinley came in.

I have stated, and I repeat, that I think it is wise for us to have a large reserve in order that timid people, people who are easily frightened as respects money matters, may constantly have before them the presence of an ample reserve for the redemption of the paper money issued directly by the United States. That reserve would not need to be so large if we were a bank of discount as well as a bank of issue, because then we could manipulate our money perhaps much better than a treasury can. Therefore the Treasury must hold a larger reserve in order that it may meet extraordinary occasions and situations which may arise and still leave no room for a panic or distrust or the fear of panic because of failure to redeem its greenback circulation on demand. So the amount is fixed at $150,000,000.

Now, there are four methods for replenishing this reserve. The first is by exchanging the greenbacks. They are redeemed as they are found in the reserve. The Secretary of the Treasury can take any gold he has in the Treasury and transfer it to the reserve and put the greenbacks into circulation. If not, any bank or individual that desires greenbacks rather than to hold gold can go and exchange gold for greenbacks.

I may say here that there is a prejudice among the American people against having in their pockets or about their persons or their homes in any way either gold or silver. We prefer paper; our country prefers paper; and therefore it is that the people are satisfied with holding the paper, provided they are always certain that it will be equal to the standard money of the country.

Now, to illustrate what I mean, I will refer to the very elaborate statement made by Mr. Carlisle before the Senator from Missouri who is nearest me [Mr. VEST]. He made an investigation, and Mr. Carlisle stated that he was able to exchange $100,000,000 of greenbacks for gold during the period of this financial disturbance, and in addition to that he thought he was required to sell these bonds.

The first is an easy method, and probably neither the second, third, or fourth method will ever be employed. The second method is that people who have gold may voluntarily come in and deposit it and take greenbacks in exchange.

Then the third provision is that the Secretary of the Treasury may procure gold coin by the method provided in section 3700 of the Revised Statutes.

The object of that is to give the Secretary of the Treasury a little latitude in times of distress or panic, so that, if need be, if he find gold in Chicago or in San Francisco, and not gold precisely where he needs it, he can exchange these greenbacks by paying the express charges of the greenbacks to San Francisco or to Chicago and the express charges of the gold in return, which, you will see, is a small premium. It is a small premium, but no Secretary of the Treasury will abuse this power. However, it is an important power that he shall hold in his hands, in order that he may be able in critical times to pay the necessary expenses in the nature of a small premium rather than to use the power given to him to sell bonds.

The next method of replenishing the Treasury is to authorize him to sell bonds when the reserve shall fall below $100,000,000. That is no new authority. I have heard that declaimed against here. That authority is now held by the Secretary of the Treasury in the most ample way; but the difficulty is that when he goes to the market and sells bonds under the statute of 1875, he is bound to sell them at 4 or 4½ or 5 per cent interest, and those bonds are payable in either ten or fifteen or thirty years, depending upon the rate of interest. So it is now that the last $100,000,000 Secretary Carlisle sold are 4 per cent bonds which are not payable until 1925.

Therefore this power is only a limitation and not an extension of the power which he now has. It is a power which requires him under these provisions, first, to exhaust other means and methods before he resorts to the extraordinary method of selling bonds for the purpose of maintaining the redemption of these notes. So who is there on either side of this Chamber who can criticise this limited power compared to the power now on our statute books? I do not see how anyone can criticise this power adversely in view of the existing law, which gives the Secretary unlimited power for a like purpose.

Now, I will state my own judgment——

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask the Senator whether under the provisions of this bill, in case there should by any misadventure be a deficit of revenues, the moneys for which the gold bought under the bill should be exchanged could be used in paying the ordinary expenses of the Government?

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator for asking the question. I would have probably alluded to that before I closed, and I will speak of it in a moment.

These bonds are to be sold under this provision only when the reserve falls below $100,000,000. Therefore, I express my own judgment and belief that there never will be a time when one dollar of these bonds will be sold or needed for the redemption of the greenbacks or United States notes. And yet it is a power that must lie behind this great duty of ours to maintain redemption and the standard of money which we have promised in every way to maintain, and which is essential to be maintained in order that the credit of our Government may remain as it is and in order that our people may not be cheated out of their earnings by piecemeal through adverse statutory provisions.

Therefore, we say that if the situation shall arise the Secretary of the Treasury shall exhaust this power as well as the other power. In other words, I may say here, that it is the intent and purpose of this bill, through the Senate amendment, that the standard of money which we now have, which settles all our business relations, carries on all our exchanges, is the basis of our credits, the basis of all our debts, shall not in any degree be disturbed, but that it shall stand as one of the essential aids to the prosperity, integrity, and credit of our country and its people.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is a full reserve for that purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. There is a full reserve for that purpose, and wholly for that purpose. Of course these greenbacks or Treasury notes, when taken out of the reserve fund, after it has fallen below $100,000,000, must be taken out from the proceeds of the sale of $50,000,000 of bonds, because if they can be taken out otherwise no bonds can be sold.

Now, when the greenbacks are taken out they are placed in the general Treasury of the United States. But there is another statute which we do not mention, because for myself I did not believe it was necessary in this bill to mention all the statutes on our statute books on every phase of the financial question. We only put in here such provisions as we regarded as essential to execute the purpose in view.

There is a statute now, passed in 1898, which, if it had been passed in 1893, would, in my judgment, have saved us much of the distress and the disaster that came from the selling of bonds in 1894 and the years that followed. That statute provides that the Secretary of the Treasury, when the expenditures are greater than the revenues, may issue to the extent of $100,000,000 certificates of indebtedness bearing not exceeding 3 per cent interest, payable in a single year. So, if in the early portion of Mr. Cleveland's Administration of the Government Mr. Carlisle had had the power to issue these certificates, it is not probable that this gold reserve at least would have been raided as it was later for the redemption of greenbacks.

The Senator from Kentucky will say to me that is not enough. Perhaps it is not, but there is still another reserve provision here. It is enough provided our expenditures are not greater than our income, because then the greenbacks will remain in the Treasury. But if our expenses are greater than our income, then the Secretary is bound under the statute of 1898 to recuperate his revenues by the means of the sale of these certificates.

These 3 per cent bonds are payable in one year after their date, and therefore it is that they become constantly redeemable and exchangeable after one year. So there is no danger and there can be no possible issue of long-time bonds such as are provided for in the act of 1875.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. LINDSAY. If the Senator will permit me to make myself perfectly clear, my recollection of the President's message is that he recommended that when greenbacks had once been redeemed in gold they should be retained in the Treasury unless exchanged for gold. Now, I do not see any provision in this bill which conforms to that recommendation.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I think I can show him that we have literally performed it.

Mr. LINDSAY. That is what I want to get at.

Mr. ALLISON. We have provided first for $150,000,000 reserve of gold. We have provided that the greenbacks thus redeemed shall remain there until the gold is placed in the reserve, and then, of course, they are taken out. Therefore we have literally carried out the President's proposition, because when a greenback is redeemed it never can get out of that redemption fund until a gold dollar goes in in place of it. So I say to my friend, who is at least in sympathy with sound money—I do not know how he feels about this bill—there is no provision here whereby the endless chain in the form so often indicated and so little understood is likely to appear again.

Mr. LINDSAY rose.

Mr. ALLISON. I am occupying more time than I intended.

Mr. LINDSAY. With the permission of the Senator, I will ask him whether or not the effect of this bill upon his interpretation of it will not be to ultimately retire the greenbacks and convert them into mere certificates of deposit of gold hereafter?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky really helps me. I do not criticise his asking the question. Under our Senate amendment the greenbacks can not be taken from the reserve without gold taking their place. In my judgment, when the time comes that we are to retire and cancel our greenbacks and Treasury notes and other forms of direct issue of money by the United States, it should not be done without the most careful consideration and scrutiny as respects the time when and the means whereby it shall be done.

It is not wise legislation, to say the least of it, for us to provide here by statute that $346,000,000 of Government money can be retired from circulation unless we at the same time place hand in hand with such a proposition a provision that will substitute other $346,000,000 of currency to take its place, not theoretically, not problematically, but by competent statute, so that timid people will not again be frightened by the specter of a contraction of current money. Therefore, Mr. President, this bill, if it means anything, does mean that the greenbacks shall continue in circulation. Indeed, we have provided in one of these sections that they shall be reissued.

Mr. LINDSAY. To get at the exact point, the greenback is redeemed and goes into the Treasury. It can not get out of it except in exchange for gold. Whether that gold be purchased——

Mr. ALLISON. It goes into the reserve fund.

Mr. LINDSAY. It goes into the reserve fund, and it can not get out except in exchange for gold, whether that gold be purchased by the sale of bonds or whether it be procured by voluntary deposit. Now, then, the greenback being released, would not the gold certificate answer all the purposes of the greenback, and is not the greenback which gets into circulation again under those circumstances virtually a gold certificate?

Mr. ALLISON. A greenback is a gold certificate now. The Treasury redeems it in gold, and to the holder, under this bill and under existing law, it is actually exchangeable for gold. We intend that it shall be as good as a gold certificate. Why, Mr. President, what is one of the provisions of this bill? It is that the Secretary of the Treasury—not at his discretion, but that it shall be his duty—shall receive gold on deposit and issue gold certificates for it.

I may say in passing that the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle, under a statute of 1882 which required him to issue gold certificates, decided that there being a provision there that gold certificates should not be issued when the gold reserve fell below $100,000,000, construed it that he had no power to resume the issue of gold certificates, though afterwards the reserve might be again increased to $100,000,000, and he held that view.

So the gold certificates that were in existence in 1893 and 1894, when the reserve fell below $100,000,000, were no longer issued, though the reserve was afterwards restored. It is a curious fact, Mr. President, that although those gold certificates, amounting to $80,000,000, were in the Treasury at the time Mr. Carlisle suspended the issue of certificates, on the 1st day of September last $34,000,000 of them were still in circulation, although not one dollar had been issued since 1894, showing the value that is placed upon these gold certificates.

On the first of September or the last of August Secretary Gage construed that law (I can not see how it could have any other construction) so that he could reissue gold certificates. I have here a statement of this date, laid upon every Senator's table. On the 12th day of February, 1900, the Secretary of the Treasury has outstanding $211,488,000 of gold certificates, an increase since September last from $33,000,000 to $211,000,000.

Therefore it is that these gold certificates are an adjunct and an auxiliary to the plan and claim which we have made here for the preservation of the gold standard and for the easy, economical, and effective method of maintaining it. So now, if you turn to your statement of this day, you will find there are $404,000,000 of gold in the Treasury of the United States, $211,000,000 of it represented by gold deposited there for gold certificates.

I will fall back for a moment and call attention to a thing which I forgot to mention. Therefore it is that this endless chain is a remote possibility and a remote contingency because the gold certificates come to supplement the greenbacks, and are just as good and no better under our provision than are the United States notes.

If a man desires gold bodily or physically, for the purpose of transporting it to other countries or for any special purpose in our own country—and gold is rarely required for actual transfer in our own country except for exportation—if a man desires gold for that purpose or for any purpose, he will not be required to rake the country over for the purpose of getting greenbacks. He will find $211,000,000 of gold certificates in circulation side by side with greenbacks, which, together with the greenbacks, sum up the gold, paper, redemption currency of our country always available for export.

Mr. President, we have not provided here for the exchange of silver notes for gold. We have not made that provision, because the committee think it wholly unnecessary, and unwise as well.

We have had the silver dollars and silver certificates in circulation in a greater or less degree since 1878 in a constantly accelerating and increasing quantity. We have pledged, as I said a while ago, absolutely the faith and the credit and the honor of this nation that the silver certificates shall be kept at a parity and constantly kept at a parity with gold.

They have been so kept, and they never have been exchangeable for gold, so far as I know, although for convenience to either those who have gold or those who have silver these exchanges may have been made. But it is one thing to use them in this way and another thing to compel their redemption by law.

There has never been a moment of time when the silver certificates were exchangeable by law; but we have made a provision here which is intended to strengthen and invigorate the silver certificates, not to destroy them and minimize them and degrade them, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and others may think we intend to do, judging from their observations.

What have we done? We have made a provision as to the silver certificates, which are the money of the Government, the money of the United States. They are here, first, by our authority and our statutes. They are here, second, because we hold in the vaults of the Treasury $125,000,000, which we have taken from the holders of these dollars and put into our Treasury; and if we are honest as a Government—and a government ought to be as honest as individuals—we will never disgrace and discredit ourselves by putting those silver certificates at a discount.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Iowa says that it is not the purpose to degrade the silver certificate. At the present time, I believe, when a silver certificate is presented at the Treasury the holder can receive only silver dollars for it.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, if those silver dollars are not considered good, and the man wants them turned into gold dollars, how does he get them?

Mr. ALLISON. Does not the Senator consider them good? They always have been good.

Mr. TILLMAN. But what I am after is to have the Senator acknowledge, if he will, that he wants the Government to redeem the silver dollars with gold dollars, if a man demands it. Is the silver dollar a dollar, or is it simply a promise to pay a gold dollar?

Mr. ALLISON. It is a dollar. The Senator from South Carolina and myself certainly do not disagree about that. It is not a promise to pay; it is a dollar of the United States. It is made a dollar by our credit and our authority, and it is a dollar which, unless we discredit and disgrace ourselves, will be kept at par with gold.

Mr. TILLMAN. How can you keep it at a par with gold unless you redeem it in gold, if somebody will be fool enough to think it is not?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the Senator by referring to his own experience and observation as to the history of twenty-one or twenty-two years, and ask him has he ever been able to buy a silver dollar at a discount? Every silver dollar he has had, every silver certificate he has had, has been worth in every mart and every market place as much as a gold dollar.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, that is merely dodging the question.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt the Senator thinks so. I give him credit for being honest in his judgment; and he certainly would not accuse me of dodging the question if he does not think so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. ALLISON. I attribute to the Senator——

Mr. TILLMAN. But will the Senator——

Mr. ALLISON. One moment. I attribute to the Senator the same honesty that I want him to attribute to me.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention again to the question? The question is, How will you keep a silver dollar on a par with a gold dollar unless you redeem it in gold?

Mr. ALLISON. We know that the sun will shine to-morrow because it has shone the day before, although we may not be familiar with the mechanism that produces it. We will keep the silver dollar at a par with gold because we have kept it at a par for twenty-two years; and notwithstanding all the shaking up and the digging up and depreciating observations made by people in various ways, the silver dollar has remained as firm as the Washington Monument, and has never diverged a hair's breadth from the standard.

But the Senator asks me what we are going to do now, and I will tell him.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. We are going to strengthen and invigorate the silver dollar. How? We are going to do it by providing how people who do not want silver dollars, but who want silver certificates and small money, may obtain them.

How does Great Britain keep her silver in circulation, and how does France keep her silver money in circulation? There are one hundred and twenty-five millions of silver in circulation in Great Britain, or about one-fourth of the entire gold circulation of Great Britain. How is the silver there kept at par?

Mr. TILLMAN. Because the silver is redeemable at the treasury in sovereigns.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not redeemable. That is where the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. TILLMAN. In certain amounts.

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all. We are the only country in the world that redeems fractional notes, and no country ever redeems fractional silver except our own. France does not do it; Germany does not do it. Look at the 14 marks per capita of silver circulating in Germany, and in addition one hundred millions of full legal-tender silver. Not one dollar of it is exchangeable under the statutes of the German Empire into gold dollars. Great Britain does not do it. She uses as much silver to her gold coin as she thinks is wise and can be kept in circulation, but she never redeems a dollar of it.

France has never exchanged her gold for silver, although she has largely more silver in circulation than we have in the United States. She redeems her paper in silver and in gold, and maintains the parity of both by a careful limit of the quantity, and the silver is current in every market place. Here silver is a full legal tender. It is by law receivable for all public dues and taxes; its circulation is limited in quantity, which has shown that it is not excessive by actual experience. But we have added in this bill a provision which will strengthen its use as a currency.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to ask the Senator if he did not know that France will pay her paper obligations in either gold or silver? We have refused to do that, although the obligations read that they are redeemable in coin; we have discriminated in favor of gold or in favor of the persons who wanted gold, and France never has done that.

Mr. ALLISON. Why, Mr. President, the Senator must be familiar, as I am sure he is, with our method, with the French method, and with the methods of all great banks and governments. The French Government has no paper money, as we have. The Bank of France issues all the money for the French Republic, and she redeems all the money of the French Republic. Her issues are based upon both silver and gold, and whilst she may at times refuse gold to people who want to export it, France has an ample reserve of gold and a sufficient reserve of silver to constantly maintain the parity of her money, and she does that without redeeming her silver in gold or her gold in silver.

Mr. President, we have inserted in this bill a provision which requires that hereafter the silver certificates shall be in denominations of $10 and under. Why have we done that? We have done it because the habits of our people are such that they prefer paper to either silver or gold, and therefore the small circulation can not well be on the gold basis; it could be, but it is not convenient to issue small gold coin. So we have provided that silver certificates representing silver dollars shall be of denominations of $10 and under.

Who finds fault with that? Is it the man who insists that the national banks shall have the privilege—because it is a privilege—of issuing small bills, for they are not redeemed as often and as rapidly as the larger bills? Is it not a power which the Government should take in its hands and use discreetly and wisely for the benefit of its own issues of currency rather than surrender it to banks of issue?

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me—I dislike to intrude on his argument.

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all; it is no intrusion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator spoke a few moments ago of the method in France of redeeming and maintaining money at par. We have no such institution here as the Bank of France, and the Treasury of the United States is the only analogous place. Now, if we issue silver certificates and those certificates are not redeemed for persons who want gold, they can not be redeemed in gold, as I understand, but they are redeemable in silver. The man having silver certificates goes to the Treasury and he gets silver dollars for them. He still wants gold, and has got his silver dollars. How is he going to get the gold?

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator wants gold in exchange I will give it to him, although I have only one piece in my pocket; or he can go to any neighbor or any bank and get gold.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will pardon me a moment.

There is no difficulty whatever, and there never has been any difficulty, in maintaining the parity of silver with gold, because that is all that is required. I want to ask the Senator—and I asked him before—does he know of an instance where silver has been depreciated? Now, what we want to do——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I want to finish my sentence.

What we want to do by this section is to give whatever advantage there may be to our Government as against other forms of money to the silver certificate, and thus decorate it as the money that goes into general circulation and is known as the money of the people.

Mr. TILLMAN. With all due deference to the Senator, I must insist that he has not answered my question, and I am afraid he will not answer it.

Mr. ALLISON. And I am afraid I will not either, if I have not done so already.

Mr. TILLMAN. It amounts to this: There are upward of three hundred millions—I think three hundred and ninety-two millions, or something along there—of silver certificates out. It may be $400,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Three hundred and ninety-two million dollars.

Mr. TILLMAN. If those silver certificates lose the confidence of the banks and of the people and people want "sound money," they want gold, and the silver certificate is now redeemable in silver and silver only. The silver certificate can not be turned into gold, and the silver itself is not gold. If a man wants gold, how will he get it? How will you maintain the parity unless they are redeemed in gold?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator's question amounts to——

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will explain it, it amounts to this, that three hundred and ninety-two millions of currency are floating here which are based on silver and redeemable in silver only. If that is to be maintained at a parity with gold, it must be redeemed in gold at the Treasury, and you can not escape from it.

Mr. ALLISON. That is only the opinion of the Senator. For twenty-two years all the facts have been against him.

Mr. President, I do not understand the Senator from South Carolina to regard silver money as a promise to pay. I do not understand him to argue or to say that he means that a silver dollar is a promise to pay.

Mr. TILLMAN. I mean under your scheme of finance that is what you are making it.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I do understand the Senator. He must study more deeply and more thoroughly the committee's plan and then he will see how easily and how absolutely we have avoided what he fears.

Mr. President, we have provided in our bill that the silver certificates shall be in denominations of $10 and under; that the national-bank notes shall be in denominations of $10 and over, and that greenbacks shall be in denominations of $10 and over.

Mr. SPOONER. How about the gold certificates?

Mr. ALLISON. The gold certificates are in denominations of $20 and over, and at least one-fourth of them shall be less than $50. We have made these provisions in addition to the provisions of law already in existence, which have proven so absolutely satisfactory; and notwithstanding all the shakings and rumblings and tumblings in our financial history the silver dollar has been uniformly good.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me ask the Senator one other question, and I shall not intrude any further upon him.

Suppose next fall that a Democratic President should be elected——

Mr. ELKINS. That is supposing too much.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is, of course, in your view an impossibility; but miracles have happened even in the United States. Suppose a Democratic President should be elected next fall, and suppose he should take it into his head to pay these silver certificates in gold.

Mr. ALLISON. How would he do it?

Mr. TILLMAN. He could not do it, because there would not be gold enough there. But suppose he should undertake to discriminate against this silver currency, which has no base under your bill, as you say, unless it is redeemable in gold; how would that silver be maintained at a parity unless it be redeemable in gold?

Mr. ALLISON. Well, Mr. President, you have got to catch your hare before you cook it. That is certain.

Mr. TILLMAN. This whole scheme, then, rests upon the condition that the party now in power shall maintain its supremacy?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir. I speak of the silver certificates and not of the probability of the election of a Democratic President. That is such a remote probability that I do not care to discuss it. [Laughter.]

I have said enough about these small notes. Now I desire to say that we have inserted in the bill a provision for refunding the public debt, which is criticised in friendly and unfriendly quarters. There are some people who think that it is an unwise thing for the Government of the United States to borrow money at 2 per cent.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not many.

Mr. ALLISON. Not many; but there are a few. Wherever there has been criticism of this feature of the bill it is a criticism in the nature of a statement that we are trying to refund our debt into bonds bearing a lower rate of interest for the benefit of the banks of the United States. If it is for the benefit of the banks of the United States to have bonds bearing 2 per cent rather than 3 or 4 per cent interest, they will understand that undoubtedly. It may be better for them, and I have no doubt it is better for them, under the provisions of this bill than for them to issue notes upon the present value of the bonds at 90 per cent of par.

People here and elsewhere seem to denounce the national banks as though they were criminals, plundering the community. The other day I heard my good friend from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] denouncing the banks of New York for placing the finances of the country and the city of New York in such a condition that the interest rate was 184 per cent. That was true for a few hours of a single day.

Was that, however, because of bank circulation? The associated banks of New York have less than $16,000,000 of all the circulation of national-bank notes. Did that gambling rate of interest or that situation in New York affect the country? From investigation I know personally that the very day that the bank rate in New York for two or three hours was 184 per cent the bank rate in all the other cities of the country was normal and neither went up nor down a farthing or a cent.

In the State of the Senator, as well as in my own, the bank rate this winter has been uniformly about 5 and 6 per cent—never higher than 6 per cent. The country is not affected, as a general thing, by what is done in Wall street for the moment when the "bulls and bears" are struggling in the arena—for that is all it amounts to. It is a fight between those people for supremacy respecting their holdings. The "bears" being triumphant for a time, the "bulls" had to put up their securities, and they found it difficult for a while to borrow money approaching the hour for settlement; but the entire country never was in a more prosperous condition, not only respecting the rate of interest, but respecting business generally.

The Senator from Nebraska the other day deplored the fact that the agricultural products of his State and mine were greatly reduced in price, whilst iron and steel, which our people consume, had largely advanced in price. Why, Mr. President, there never was a time when the principal agricultural products of the Senator's State and mine were higher on an average than they are now.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will allow me, wheat never was as low in the history of Iowa and Nebraska as it is to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. I spoke of the principal products. I did not speak of wheat.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, corn is no higher than it was eight years ago.

Mr. ALLISON. That may be, but corn and cattle and hogs are 30 or 40 per cent at least higher than they were in 1896.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will further permit me in this connection—and I shall not interrupt him any further—two of the complaints against this bill which I make is that it turns over the whole power to issue currency and to control that currency to an organization of national banks——

Mr. ALLISON. I knew that was the Senator's objection.

Mr. ALLEN. And second, the bill perpetuates and increases the national debt.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I wish to say but a few words more in respect to the circulation of the national banks and the power of which the Senator speaks. We have two hundred and forty-two millions of national-bank notes now in circulation, and we have more than a thousand millions of other paper money, and every dollar now in circulation must and under this bill will remain in circulation. Therefore, it is a case of the tail wagging the dog, according to the Senator's theory. Two hundred and forty-two millions can not control a thousand millions.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator again permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. ALLEN. One of my principal objections to the bill is—and it is a true construction—that every dollar of paper money, greenbacks, Treasury notes, and silver dollars, becomes impounded and redeemable in gold; that all these forms of money will pass out in the course of a short time, and that the channel now occupied by them will be occupied by national-bank notes.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator, of course, has his opinion about that; but I feel sure, from his intelligence and discriminating capacity, when he studies the bill carefully, the fears now agonizing him will disappear like the mists of the morning, as the amendments I am discussing can not have that result.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield for a question. I am now trespassing upon the time of my friend from Nevada [Mr. JONES], who is ready to proceed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I simply rise to set myself right, and maybe the Senator will give me the light I seek. I find, in putting my question in regard to the possibility of the election of a Democratic President, I used the word "gold" instead of "silver." I meant to ask the Senator, Suppose a Democratic President should take it into his head, under the contention of the Senator, that a silver dollar is a dollar and to redeem a gold certificate with a silver dollar?

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator want an answer to that?

Mr. TILLMAN. The law would prohibit it.

Mr. ALLISON. The law would prohibit it. If the Senator is looking to the election of a President who would violate the law and good conscience as well, then, of course, he might pay silver for gold.

Mr. TILLMAN. The point I tried to get and did not get any light on from the Senator was how the silver dollar and the silver certificates are to be kept as good as gold unless they are redeemable in gold?

Mr. ALLISON. If what I have already said has not convinced the Senator from South Carolina, then it is impossible for me to convince him.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the silver dollars are dollars, they certainly ought to be received by any Department and paid out by the Treasury in payment of any of its paper obligations.

Mr. ALLISON. They will be so received. They are receivable now in the payment of public and private dues. If the Senator goes out to the Secretary's office and asks for $100, I venture to say that he would be paid entirely in silver certificates, and he is bound to take them.

Mr. TILLMAN. It will not do for the Senator to undertake to get around this question by referring to his or my personal transactions or other small transactions in this Chamber. It is a question of how these three hundred and ninety-two millions of paper based on silver are to be maintained under the gold standard unless they are redeemable in gold.

Mr. ALLISON. I have answered that as far as I can.

In response to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], I said that the staple products of his State and mine are higher now by 30 or 40 per cent than they were in 1896. So staple farm products have advanced in price, though not perhaps pari passu. They have advanced very largely in price since 1896, as have manufactured articles; but the price of manufactured articles depends largely upon the supply and demand of those articles from time to time.

Mr. President, I shall not occupy much time on this question. We have provided in the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance for the refunding of the interest-bearing obligations of the Government due in 1904, 1907, and 1908. It is not a compulsory refunding, but it is a refunding at the will of the holder of the bonds, taking them at the offer made by the Government.

It seemed to us that it was wise to bring in this plan for refunding, because, in the first place, it is a favorable time to do it. The rate of interest which we propose in the amendment is the rate which the holders of bonds have received for the last few months on the market value of their bonds; and it is the normal rate, or likely to be the normal rate in the near and distant future, for bonds of the United States in our own country.

There is no disguising the fact that our Government bonds, because of their fewness in number and of the uses to which they can be applied, are more valuable than the government bonds of countries where they are not so used and who have much larger issues than have we.

This Congress or the next Congress must adopt a refunding bill, and it is wiser and better that the refunding should take place gradually, in order that there may be no disturbance of the locality of the bonds and of their status respecting the money market, if you please to call it such. In other words, if there is an easy transition and exchange, the bonds will gradually be converted into the new bonds provided for without the slightest friction in any local or central market.

So it is wise that we should take hold of this question in reasonable time in order that the conversions may be gradual. This is no new thing. We refunded our entire public debt by a statute passed in 1870, and yet it was not effective as to all the bonds until 1879.

That statute of 1870 was eight or nine years in performing its function, and yet that exchange from 6 per cent to 5 per cent and 4 per cent bonds was made during a time when there were favorable markets, so that there was no friction in the money market respecting the enormous changes of bonds and placing them among one set of people when they had been in the hands of another. So we thought it was wise to do it by this easy method, and we pursued an economical method.

I have no doubt that there are a great many people who would rather see us go right up to that verge of the maturity of the $559,000,000 of 4 percents in order that they might be able to say "We will take the entire loan at so much per cent," and possibly at an unfavorable period. On the other hand, we say it is wiser and better to do this gradually without friction and without the intervention of the middlemen or bankers, who are always ready and always willing to discharge such functions for the Government——

Mr. TELLER. For a consideration.

Mr. ALLISON. For a consideration, as the Senator suggests, though a small consideration, of course, because they have a way of doing things which enables them to aid themselves a little, even after the refunding takes place.

Mr. TELLER. Will it interrupt the Senator if I should thrust in here at present the remark that the national banks, in consideration for their services, hold nearly $168,000,000 of Government money without paying any interest upon it?

Mr. ALLISON. I think that is understood.

Mr. TELLER. I was afraid the Senator had forgotten that.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I have not forgotten it. I understand that perfectly well. We do not change that.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLISON. We do not change that in this bill, because that is one of the things not germane to the question we are dealing with in this bill. There were a great many things which we did not deal with; we did not deal with the tariff; we did not deal with the shipping bill, and some other things. We tried to confine ourselves to the things we wanted to do, adapting those things to the present conditions and the present state of the law.

Mr. President, the national banks are not obliged, I repeat, to exchange their bonds unless they wish to do so. If they do, we shall save $15,000,000 per annum in interest; and that, in an economical sort of government and in a government that has not money to throw away or money to burn, amounts to something in the course of a year. It will help a long way toward the payment of some bills and laws which have been pressed upon Congress with a vigor and an earnestness that I have not seen in a good many years.

So, Mr. President, when we are fussing about trying to find ways to save money, when we have an opportunity of saving from the beginning, and if all are funded, fifteen millions annually, why say wait, wait until these bonds mature, when perhaps an unfavorable monetary situation will arise, and then, instead of being able to fund them at the low rate of 2 per cent, we will be asked to pay 3 or 4 per cent, as we were compelled to do in 1893?

We need not be gibbeted on the crossroads of public opinion for undertaking to favor the national banks by requiring them to use a 2 per cent bond instead of a 3 or 4 per cent bond, when at the same time we are saving to the people of the United States $15,000,000 per annum.

Every private corporation, every private business, is doing this. Why should we not do it? Take the great railroad systems of our country. They have been and are producing incalculable benefit to the people of the United States by being able to refund their bonds into 3½ percents instead of sixes and sevens. The same is true of private debtors.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] and I can congratulate each other that the farmers of Iowa and Nebraska, who have been compelled for all these years to pay 7 per cent interest as the lowest rate, and commissions besides, have for the last two or three years been able to borrow money at 5 per cent upon long time without the payment of commissions.

Is it no boon to a man who, either for the purposes of enlarging his business or buying an additional farm or by some misfortune, has been compelled to go into debt to have a Government that so adjusts and arranges its finances and so establishes and uses its credit that he can borrow money at 2 or 3 per cent per annum less than he paid before?

When I hear these criticisms against this plan to reduce the rate of interest upon our Government bonds, I feel as though there must be a cat in some part of the meal somewhere—certainly not among those who discuss or criticise adversely the bill.

Mr. President, I have gone over the bill as best I could, endeavoring to explain its provisions in detail. I may have omitted some things which I ought to have discussed, but I have undertaken to show that this bill, by and large, has no concealments or prevarications or innuendoes. There is nothing here but what is plainly written upon the face of the proposed statute.

There is nothing lying behind it. We stand here upon it as an open declaration of our aims and our purposes, without concealment, leaving little discretionary power either in the Secretary of the Treasury or in the President of the United States.

We say that these provisions will maintain, in adverse as well as in good fortune, in hard as well as in good times, the standard of value which has been the standard of all our transactions since 1879; and the man who now, for merely sentimental reasons or because he wants free silver or because he wants to destroy greenbacks, fails to come to the rescue, by his vote, of the plans and purposes of this bill will fail, in my judgment, in discharging the public duty he owes to the people he represents and to the country.

[Mr. JONES of Nevada addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have read the arrangement we have made as to the debate to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read to the Senate the unanimous consent given on some former day.

The Secretary read as follows:

AGREEMENT TO VOTE ON H. R. 1.

February 15, 1900.—Agreement, by unanimous consent, that the vote upon the passage of H. R. 1 and pending amendments be taken some time during Thursday, the 15th of February, and that two days, including the 15th, shall be given to the discussion of amendments under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether that limits all speaking to-morrow to the ten-minute rule?

Mr. CHANDLER. Before that question is determined, I should like to ask the Presiding Officer what he would consider as "pending amendments?" Many amendments have been handed in at the desk and printed, but of course there can be but one amendment pending at a time.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the word "pending" is not in the agreement.

Mr. CHANDLER. I heard the word "pending" read, I believe.

Mr. ALDRICH. It does not say pending.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Presiding Officer have the agreement read again?

Mr. ALDRICH. The word "pending" is not there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read that portion of the agreement again.

The Secretary read as follows:

And that two days, including the 15th, shall be given to the discussion of amendments under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Chair allow any number of amendments in the first degree to be offered to-morrow?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That was certainly the understanding.

Mr. ALDRICH. The understanding, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire, was that the substitute reported by the Senate committee should be treated as the original bill and open to amendment to the second degree.

Mr. CHANDLER. So that an amendment may be offered and an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; all amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, the other question, if the Senator from Colorado will allow me, is whether we are to discuss the particular amendments one by one and vote upon them or discuss them all first and vote upon them all at once?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is immaterial to me.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now return the floor to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to have a few moments to answer some suggestions made this afternoon by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], which I could not do to-day without interfering with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. I do not feel that I ought to go on at this time of the evening.

Mr. ALDRICH. I presume there will be no trouble in accommodating the Senator from Colorado to-morrow. I do not think any Senator will object.

Mr. TELLER. If there are enough Senators who wish to speak to-morrow, so that the whole time will be occupied, I shall not speak beyond my ten minutes; if not, I should like a little more time.

Mr. CHANDLER. Why not meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. COCKRELL. I was about to make that suggestion. It would give us an hour more.

Mr. ALDRICH. There has been a Republican caucus called for to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh!

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. My own impression is that the unanimous-consent agreement applies strictly to the time beginning after 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Arkansas is right about that, because at the time the agreement was made we were on the 2 o'clock arrangement. I think the Senator from Arkansas is right.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The time between the close of the routine business in the morning and 2 o'clock may be devoted to debate, and the Senator from Colorado can take what time he chooses.

Mr. TELLER. I will take the chances of getting in some remarks to-morrow. If I interfere with anybody I will submit myself to the ten-minute rule.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think there will be any objection.

Mr. TELLER. I will do that the first thing in the morning.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE CHICKERING.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of CHARLES A. CHICKERING, late a member of the House from the State of New York, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. BABCOCK, Mr. CUMMINGS, Mr. LITTAUER, Mr. DE GRAFFENREID, Mr. DAVIDSON, Mr. GILLET of New York, Mr. ALEXANDER, and Mr. OTEY as a committee on the part of the House to take charge of the funeral arrangements.

Mr. PLATT of New York. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York offers resolutions which will be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. CHARLES A. CHICKERING, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the presiding officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions submitted by the Senator from New York.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed, under the second resolution, as the committee on the part of the Senate, Mr. PLATT of New York, Mr. MASON, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. TURNER, and Mr. SULLIVAN.

Mr. PLATT of New York. As a further measure of respect, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 14, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 13, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Once more, Almighty God, in Thy providence Thou hast brought us face to face with that which awaits us all. The Angel of Death has visited us and taken from this body one of its true, its noble, its pure members. We pray Thee that we may be impressed with the uncertainty of life and make ourselves ready, so that when the call comes we shall be prepared to go on to that larger life, doing Thy bidding and fulfilling our mission, now and then and always. In the name of Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 83, increasing the limit of cost of the new building for the Government Printing Office, to meet the increased prices of building materials, and to permit of making the south end of the power-house extension of the same height as the main building. I ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up Senate joint resolution 83, in regard to the Government Printing Office, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the limit of cost of the new building for the Government Printing Office, authorized by the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1899, be, and hereby is, increased by $429,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to meet the increased prices of building materials, and to permit of making the south end of the power-house extension, for a depth of about 45 feet from G street NW., of the same height as the main building.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the gentleman make a brief statement as to the necessity for the passage of this resolution. I have investigated the matter somewhat myself, but still I know the members of the House will be glad to hear a statement as to the necessity.

Mr. HEATWOLE. This is asked for on account of the increased price of material. At the time the estimates were made for the building it was thought that $2,000,000 would be sufficient, but since that time the cost of material has increased to such an extent that it will require about 25 per cent more to complete this building and extend the power house to five stories, as now contemplated. If this matter is any longer delayed, it will undoubtedly increase the cost of the building.

General Wilson, the Chief of Engineers, and the Public Printer are both very desirous that immediate action be taken, so that the contracts can be let and expense be saved to the Government.

Mr. McRAE. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of this resolution if it has been favorably reported by any committee of the House.

Mr. HEATWOLE. It is a Senate resolution, and it has been taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. McRAE. Has it or a similar resolution been approved by the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Not by that committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand it meets with the favor of the members who compose the House Committee on Printing.

Mr. HEATWOLE. While there was no formal meeting to consider the resolution, it has their approval.

Mr. McRAE. Would it not properly go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. HEATWOLE. I think not. I think it would go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. McRAE. I do not want to object to any enlargement of this building, or any necessary legislation to complete the Government Printing Office as soon as possible, but I think it is rather a dangerous precedent to take up any proposition to appropriate money without the judgment of the committee that properly has jurisdiction of the subject. If this proposition has the approval of the members of the committee, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEATWOLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MISSISSIPPI CHOCTAWS.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a document a petition of the Mississippi Choctaws, which was introduced in the House by me on yesterday and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. In making this request, I do not ask to have printed a couple of exhibits which are reports of committees of the House and which are already printed and can be obtained. I ask for the printing of the usual number.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the printing, as a document, of the usual number of a petition of the Mississippi Choctaws, with the exception of two printed documents. Is there objection?

Mr. HEATWOLE. I will ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether there are any plates or maps accompanying the document?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. There are none.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

DRAFT ANIMALS FOR THE ARMY.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5267) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to suspend the operation of certain provisions of law relating to the War Department, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to suspend the operation of certain provisions of law relating to the War Department, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1899, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"That the operation of the following provisions of law be, and is hereby, continued suspended for such further time as, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, may be found necessary, or until otherwise provided by Congress, not longer, however, than June 30, 1901:

"First. The provision of the first section of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes,' in the following words:

"'Provided, That hereafter no part of this appropriation shall be expended in the purchase for the Army of draft animals until the number on hand shall be reduced to 5,000, and thereafter shall only be expended for the purchase of a number sufficient to keep the supply up to 5,000.'

"Second. The provisions of the first section of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes,' in the following words:

"'Provided, That hereafter no part of the appropriations for the Quartermaster's Department shall be expended on printing unless the same shall be done by contract, after due notice and competition, except in such cases as the emergency will not admit of the giving notice for competition: Provided further, That after advertisement, all the supplies for the use of the various departments and posts of the Army and of the branches of the Army service shall hereafter be purchased where the same can be purchased the cheapest in the markets of the United States, quality and cost of transportation and the interest of the Government considered, except that purchases may be made in open market, in the manner common among business men, when the aggregate amount required does not exceed $200, but every such purchase shall be immediately reported to the Secretary of War.'

"And the words:

"'Provided, That the number of horses purchased under this appropriation, added to the number on hand, shall not at any time exceed the number of enlisted men and Indian scouts in the mounted service, and that no part of this appropriation shall be paid out for horses not purchased by contract, after competition duly invited by the Quartermaster's Department and an inspection by such Department, all under the direction and authority of the Secretary of War.'

"And the words:

"'Provided, That not more than $1,000,000 of the sums appropriated by this act shall be paid out for the services of civilian employees in the Quartermaster's Department, including those heretofore paid out of the funds appropriated for regular supplies, incidental expenses, barracks and quarters, army transportation, clothing, camp and garrison equipage; that no employee paid therefrom shall receive a salary more than $150 per month, unless the same be specially fixed by law.'

"Third. So much of the act approved March 15, 1898, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899,' under the heading, 'Ordnance Department,' as provides that not more than $65,000 of the money appropriated for the Ordnance Department in all its branches shall be applied to the payment of civilian clerks in said department."

SEC. 2. That during the time the operation of the foregoing provisions of law shall remain so suspended pursuant to this act materials required by the War Department may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be purchased abroad and shall be admitted free of duty.

SEC. 3. That during the same time the Bureau of Ordnance of the War Department is authorized to purchase, without advertisement, such ordnance and ordnance stores as are needed for immediate use; and when such ordnance and ordnance stores are to be manufactured, then to make contracts without advertisement for such stores, to be delivered as rapidly as manufactured.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, we should be very glad to have some explanation of the bill. It is almost impossible to follow the reading of anything like that. I should also like to have the gentleman state if it has the unanimous report of his committee.

Mr. HULL. It was unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman also state the emergency or the necessity for passing this now, instead of letting it take its regular course?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, in 1898, when it was determined to increase the Army, the Congress, after a full discussion, passed a bill of this character, suspending the operation of these provisions of law for one year. In 1899 they again passed the same bill, suspending the provisions of the law until the 1st of March, 1900. The Army is still occupying these islands, and is increased away beyond the 25,000 limit which existed at the time these restrictions were imposed, and the War Department report that it is impossible for them to administer affairs unless there is another suspension. The suspension this time goes simply for the next fiscal year and expires at the time when the Congress of the United States must take action, one way or the other, as to the size and character of the Army.

This provision is temporary in its character. My own judgment would be that it would be just as well to repeal these restrictions absolutely now, but that would be a change that the War Department does not ask. Every man here knows that it is impossible for the Army to get along with 5,000 draft animals. When we had 25,000 troops only, and all those at home, they could do it. There is no man here who would be willing to restrict the Army now in the number of horses to the number of men in the cavalry and the mounted scouts, because in Luzon we are at this time mounting infantry to send through the island, and the importance of the measure is urged upon the committee by the War Department and by every bureau chief. The committee, both Democrats and Republicans, were unanimous that the legislation should be had at once.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CAPRON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 77) to provide for pay to certain officers of the Marine Corps.

DEATH OF HON. CHARLES A. CHICKERING.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it is my painful duty to announce to the House the death of Hon. CHARLES A. CHICKERING, late a Representative from the State of New York. At some future time I shall ask the House to set aside a day on which to pay fitting tribute to the high character and distinguished services of the deceased.

Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask for their immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were adopted.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the committee appointed on the part of the House, in pursuance of the second resolution just adopted:

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

AMENDMENTS TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HARRIS. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the Indian appropriation bill, with certain documents, which I ask to have printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let the proposed amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill, providing for the ratification of an agreement with the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, formerly a part of the Indian Territory.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I inquire what the papers are that it is desired to have printed?

Mr. HARRIS. They are simply affidavits and evidence with regard to the lands and the desirability for opening them up to settlement. I will state that they are simply intended to supply the committee with necessary information concerning the character of the lands and the propriety of opening them up to settlement.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is apparently a very large bundle of papers.

Mr. HARRIS. They are in manuscript, loosely folded. There is not so much matter to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to printing the papers? The Chair hears none. The amendment and accompanying papers will be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. THURSTON submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the Osage tribe of Indians, in Oklahoma Territory, a sum equal to $700 per capita, the same to be deducted from the fund now held in trust by the United States for said tribe, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6237) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to suspend the operation of certain provisions of law relating to the War Department, and for other purposes," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read to the Senate the agreement under which this bill must now be proceeded with.

The Secretary read as follows:

February 15, 1900.—Agreement, by unanimous consent, that the vote upon the passage of H. R. 1 and pending amendments be taken some time during Thursday, the 15th of February, and that two days, including the 15th, shall be given to the discussion of amendments under the ten-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hold that it will be entirely in order to propose amendments up to the time of the final vote on the bill to-morrow.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope later in the day to have an hour fixed at which the final vote shall be taken to-morrow. I do not press that request now, but later in the day, before adjournment, I will ask the Senate to fix an hour at which the final vote shall be taken upon the bill and amendments.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. My impression was, without paying special attention at the time the request was made, that the amendments were to be disposed of as they were discussed during to-day and to-morrow.

Mr. ALDRICH. That was my understanding, and I hope that course will be followed. That is what I propose, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think it very much better to dispose of the amendments as they are taken up, one by one.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], under the suggestion made yesterday, expects to go on until, perhaps, 2 o'clock, or he will take such time as he sees fit after 2 o'clock. I hope the Senate will proceed to dispose of the amendments as rapidly as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They would be disposed of, under the rule, as they were offered, unless there was unanimous consent otherwise.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, the only other point is whether other amendments can be offered up to the last moment.

Mr. SPOONER. The Chair so held.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Chair said they could.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think so; beyond question.

Mr. CHANDLER. There have been one or two misunderstandings in the Senate as to whether amendments that had not been previously submitted and printed could be offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hold that amendments may be offered up to the time of the final vote on the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope no amendments will be offered except those which are submitted to-day or in time so that they can be thoroughly understood and discussed. I think it better all around that that should be done, although I suppose there can be no rule of that kind established.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There ought not to be any effort made to cut off amendments. If anybody chooses to offer an amendment at any time before the final vote, it is his right to offer it.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; there is no disposition on this side to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance, on which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I stated last night I would not venture to take the floor to speak on the pending bill at that time, and I will not do so now, if any Senator desires to speak. I have consulted several Senators and find no one who is desirous of speaking at this time. Therefore I feel at liberty, unless some Senator rises to speak, to go on.

We have had three speeches from members of the committee on this bill; but all three of them have absolutely ignored the House bill. One member of the committee, I think, asserted that the House bill was not before the Senate. Technically, the House bill is the bill we are considering. It is the bill that comes here for our attention. It would be a gross breach of privilege, Mr. President, for the Senate to decline to consider it. We are considering it. We are considering it upon the theory that that measure has had the the approval of one branch of the legislative department of the Government. Nobody can say here that if the Senate amendment passes by the unanimous vote of the Senate it is likely to become a law and meet the approval of the other branch of Congress.

Mr. President, as I said before, this necessitates, it seems to me, the discussion of both bills, the House bill and the amendment proposed by the Senate committee. Yet we have had no discussion on the part of those who favor this radical departure in the money system of the country, and if that bill should become a law by action of the conference committee we shall either be compelled to discuss it on the conference committee report or to avoid any discussion of it, unless we discuss it now.

Some days ago I submitted to the committee some suggestions upon which some of us who are opposed to the bill would like enlightenment. I do not suppose that it will be out of place if I shall say that I have privately submitted some queries to the members of the committee, and yet with the completion of the discussion on the part of the members of the committee there has not been a reference made to the House bill, except in a way to leave the inference that it was not worthy of discussion. I will not say that Senators said it was not worthy of discussion, but at all events it has been left undiscussed.

LEGAL-TENDER QUALITY OF SILVER DOLLARS.

I do not desire to go over the entire range covered by the bill, but there is one provision in it that I want, before I go any further, to ask some member of the committee to explain, because I am under the impression that the House bill is quite as likely to be enacted into law as the Senate amendment, or at least features of it are likely to become a part of the law.

I find this, which I supposed some member of the committee would speak of, because their attention has certainly been called to it. I am only going to advert to it, and I shall leave it; and if no member of the committee under the ten-minute rule sees fit to tell us what it means we will have to conjecture its meaning for ourselves.

In the second section of the House bill there is the following provision:

> Nothing herein contained shall be construed or held to affect the present legal-tender quality of the silver dollar, or of the subsidiary or minor coins, or of the paper currency of the United States, or the laws making national-bank notes receivable and payable for certain public debts and dues and obligations between national banks.

Mr. President, it has been held by courts that words that were not necessary for construction inserted in a statute must be inserted there for a purpose.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Does the Senator want a reply now?

Mr. TELLER. I will hear the Senator now. I have not heard him on this bill yet.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will say that as a member of the committee I was utterly unable to understand what that did mean, taken in connection with the provision that all contracts, public and private, should be payable in gold.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have had some trouble with it myself. If I had not, I should not have suggested that the committee should enlighten us. But those words are put in there ex industria. They are not there by accident, I may say, because I have the strong support of the Senator who sits before me [Mr. ALLISON], who said that the act of 1873 had been doctored. I am justified in suspecting that words that are not plain to me have a hidden and intended meaning, and that there is some construction to be put upon these words when you come to administer the law, if this bill shall become a law. As I see it, there is but one thing that the expression can mean, and if it does not mean that, it is in there only because of the ignorance of the drafter of the bill. That it is there on account of ignorance can not be imagined, as the bill was drafted by a commission composed of some of the most eminent gold-standard people in the United States and some of the most acute and technical lawyers on the continent.

There are two classes of bills that the American people use that are reissued after being returned to the Treasury Department. A silver certificate, when it goes to the Treasury Department in payment of dues and debts, goes out again as money, either the same identical bill or a new one in its place, greenbacks when they are retired.

Mr. ALDRICH. Treasury notes also.

Mr. TELLER. Treasury notes also. When greenbacks go to the Treasury either for redemption in gold or when they go there to pay a debt that the citizen owes to the Government they are reissued.

Now, "the present legal-tender quality" is not to be disturbed. When they are reissued, the technical lawyers who drafted this bill will go before the Supreme Court if necessary and assert that these words were put in there ex industria, that no reissue should have legal-tender quality, and the Supreme Court will be compelled to say that this word "present" has no meaning whatever, or else that it means what I say it means. If any member of the committee wants to tell me now what it means, I shall be very glad to listen, or if any member of the committee will tell me later, and if the members of the committee have not any opinion on the subject, I should like to know that also.

Mr. ALDRICH. I said to the Senator from Colorado in the course of his discussion of the bill some days ago that I would very frankly admit that I did not understand what those words meant or why they were put there. If the Senator's assumption should be correct and the conference committee should come back here and recommend the Senate to adopt those words, if we recommend any such action as that, we will be ready to explain what they mean at that time.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the committee which is dealing with this question and which will deal with it in conference to this very important provision that comes to us from the House. But blind as it is, it is absolutely consistent with the legislation on the financial question for the last twenty-odd years. There has not been frank and fair legislation. In 1890 we passed an act that I voted for with great reluctance, and I have always been glad that, standing at this seat, I declared that it was indefensible as a money measure and unscientific and that I only accepted it because it was the best that we could get and because it released sixty-odd million dollars in the Treasury and made a possibility of raising the price of silver. We put in that act a declaration that it was the policy of the Government of the United States to maintain the parity between the two metals, to keep the great money metals as near together as possible. That has been construed as a declaration that the silver certificates that were issued were redeemable in gold. So I am afraid whenever any of these provisions come up that are not plain and open they will be construed later into some injury to the interests of the American people.

I want the committee to understand that if this provision comes back here as a part of the conference report, it can come with no other intent or purpose, and that that, in my judgment, is the intent and purpose of the House bill, to surreptitiously—and I will say that, even though it may be a breach of privilege—to surreptitiously deny to the reissued greenbacks, Treasury notes, and silver certificates legal-tender functions. I am justified in that conclusion because the commission responsible for the bill, of which, perhaps, I may speak later and more in detail, in almost every line of its report inveighed against the legal-tender quality of greenbacks, Treasury notes, and silver certificates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's ten minutes have expired.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that I am not speaking under the ten-minute rule; that that does not begin until 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that that construction may be put upon the unanimous-consent agreement. At the time the consent was given we were then proceeding under that arrangement.

Mr. BATE. I understood that the Senator from Colorado had until 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALDRICH. At the time the consent was given we were proceeding then to consider the bill at 2 o'clock. I would suggest that the agreement is susceptible to that construction, and I hope no objection will be made to the Senator proceeding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to such a construction, that the rule applies at 2 o'clock to-day, and not before?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears none. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I will leave that question, because it is a little dangerous. It is dangerous in this particular, that if the only plausible construction which seems possible is put upon it it almost it not quite brings a charge of unfairness against another branch ot the legislative department.

Mr. ALLISON rose.

Mr. TELLER. My excuse for this statement is that it passed the House without attention being called to the exact meaning of it. Now I will hear what the Senator from Iowa has to say.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to say a single word on that point?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to suggest to the Senator that the second section in terms can not apply to silver dollars or silver certificates, for the reason that section 2, if the Senator will allow me a moment——

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Section 2 of the House bill provides—

That all interest-bearing obligations of the United States for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, and all United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the law of July 14, 1890, shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1 of this act, etc.

That is the specific provision which the Senator, I understand, is discussing in connection with the words "present legal-tender quality of the silver dollar."

Mr. TELLER. Yes; that is right.

Mr. ALLISON. Just why the words "the present legal-tender quality of the silver dollar" were inserted I certainly do not know, because the prior clause has no relation to the silver dollar. I can see how a construction might be put upon the two clauses taken together as respects the greenbacks and the Treasury notes, the first clause providing that these notes "shall be deemed and held to be payable in the gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1," etc. Now, if it should be held hereafter that when an interest-bearing obligation is paid, or when a noninterest-bearing obligation is paid, then it could not be reissued without specific authority of Congress, which I do not find in the House bill, but the present legal-tender quality is preserved, so that until these notes are paid they are still a legal tender——

Mr. TELLER. How after they are reissued?

Mr. ALLISON. There is no specific provision in the House bill for the reissue. The Senate amendment provides for their reissue. Therefore the courts might be called upon, under that first clause, to decide whether, when a greenback was paid, it could be reissued without specific authority. But if that construction should be put upon it, the present legal-tender quality of greenbacks would not be disturbed.

Mr. TELLER. It was contended by the friends of the bill—I mean the House bill—that there was nothing in the bill which would prevent the reissue.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know who actually made that contention.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was no one in the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I am not talking about the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh.

Mr. TELLER. I thought I would leave that point, but let me read the second section:

Nothing herein contained—

That is, in the whole bill. I think the courts would construe it so, although, of course, it is enough for them to apply it to the section.

Nothing herein contained shall be construed or held to affect the present legal-tender quality of the silver dollar or of the subsidiary or minor coins or of the paper currency of the United States.

That clause takes in the silver certificate. That is a part of the paper currency of the United States as much as greenbacks.

Mr. ALLISON. But the silver certificate is not a legal tender.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not a legal tender.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not a legal tender now.

Mr. TELLER. It is a legal tender for all Government dues. It is a qualified legal tender, Mr. President.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree.

Mr. TELLER. And that is one of the things that have held it at a parity with gold. Every man who owes the Government a debt, whether it be on account of import duties or on any other account, can walk up to the Treasury Department and put down the silver certificate and discharge that debt, and every man who takes the silver certificate takes it with the knowledge that it will perform that important function of money; and thus it enters into the value of every single silver certificate that is created. Later, if I have time, I am going to talk about what has maintained the parity between the silver dollar and the gold dollar; but I will leave that for the present.

I want to repeat that I approach this discussion, as I said before, with suspicion, for I heard the distinguished Senator from Iowa yesterday say that the credit-strengthening act of 1869, which provided for the payment of gold bonds in coin and nothing else, had practically made the greenback redeemable in gold.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. Did I not understand the Senator to say that yesterday?

Mr. ALLISON. If I did say it, it was a lapsus. I certainly had no intention to say that, because that would not be true. What I did say, if the Senator will allow me a moment——

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. What I did say was that the credit-strengthening act of 1869 provided that the bonds should be payable in coin, but they should not be so paid until the United States notes were also redeemable in gold and silver. Therefore, all United States notes by the strengthening act of 1869 would be payable in either metal. I did not mean to be so understood; and I certainly did not say that.

Mr. TELLER. I shall not hold the Senator to the strict statement that he made, because I realize that when a Senator makes a speech, as he made his yesterday and as I am making mine to-day, sometimes he is a little careless of his words. He certainly gave me to understand that; and I looked into the RECORD this morning to find his speech, but unfortunately I did not find it there.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that, what is an unusual thing for me, I asked an opportunity to look over the notes, but they did not come to me until a pretty late hour in the evening and I have not yet looked at them. So that whatever statement I made appears.

Mr. TELLER. I shall refer perhaps to some other things the Senator said, and if I misunderstood him or misrepresent him I hope he will feel free to correct me.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator.

Mr, TELLER. I will be glad to have his correction.

STANDARD OF VALUE.

Now I want to touch a few minutes on the Senator's position on the question of standard. I listened yesterday to the very remarkable speech of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], in which he dealt very interestingly and very scientifically with the question of standard. I understand the unit of value is nothing in the world but simply a start to account from, and that the unit of value might not be represented, as the Senator said yesterday, by any coin whatever, and that for several hundred years Great Britain had a unit, but no coin that represented it. I think it is within the last thirty or forty years that she has not had a coin, the sovereign, to represent her standard. There are half a dozen countries which have a unit, but have no coin to represent it.

The establishment of a unit out of silver or gold does not make a gold standard or a silver standard. If a nation should declare that there should be two units of value and one should be made out of gold and the other out of silver, that would not be bimetallism unless, in addition to that declaration, the nation making it should open its mints to the coinage of the two metals alike. That is what determines it, not the unit. We were not on a silver standard because the unit of 1792 was made out of silver of the value of the Spanish milled dollar. We would not have been on a gold standard because the unit of value of 1873 was made out of 25.8 grains of standard gold. If the mints had been left open to the coinage of the silver dollar and the gold dollar alike, not necessarily the gold dollar or the silver dollar would have been the standard, but coins that had an established relation between one another by law.

Mr. President, we are not legally on the gold standard to-day, and we have not been legally on the gold standard. As the result of the action of the Treasury Department we are practically on the gold standard, but, as I said, not legally so. There is no justification whatever for this legislation unless it is upon the theory that we are not upon the gold standard and that the legislative mind is that we should go to the gold standard. That is what the bill means, and that is all it does mean, Mr. President. We are on what is sometimes called the limping silver standard and sometimes the limping gold standard, for it is neither a silver nor a gold standard, and it is not true bimetallism.

In the conference at Brussels the Senator from Iowa was a prominent member. I should like to say something rather complimentary to him, but I am afraid in doing so I might be tempted to say something uncomplimentary to some member of the commission whose course did not meet my approval; therefore for the present I shall have to pass that, and simply say I have no complaint to make as to the course of the Senator at the Brussels conference.

Mr. FORAKER. Will not the Senator give us the names?

Mr. TELLER. It would be invidious to give names. In that conference one gentleman making a speech said the United States was on the gold standard. The president of that conference, who was a man of great repute in England and throughout Europe, when he got the floor very promptly said that the United States was not on the gold standard, but on the limping standard. Mr. Tirard, of France, repeatedly said in debate that France was not on the gold standard nor on the silver standard, but on the limping standard. If he had been talking in Greek he would have called it the scalene standard; that is, where one leg is shorter than the other. Nobody outside of the United States has considered us as being on the gold standard.

I do not think that is very important; but, as I said before, practically we have been forced to the gold standard by Executive usurpations, by a refusal to obey the law, by the voluntary surrender, through President Cleveland, for nothing, to the bondholder of a great right which the American people have, and which they declared was worth, on a small issue of bonds, $16,000,000. How much, I would like to inquire, is it worth on this great reissue? It was by usurpation, by transgression of the law, that we were put upon this standard; and what you are afraid of, and the reason why you are here with this bill, is that you fear the American people will send somebody here and put somebody in the White House and put somebody in the other House of Congress who will have the courage to stand for the interests of the whole people and enforce the law. So you go around the country, or your agents do, saying, We mean to fix the conditions so that the gold standard can not be disturbed. If the gold standard had been established by law, it could not be disturbed unless by legislation. You can not deny this to the American people, much as you may desire so to do.

EFFECT OF TARIFF.

The Senator from Iowa took occasion to speak of the condition of the country in 1893, when a majority of his associates in this Chamber—and a majority of the Republicans—joined a Democratic Administration and gave more votes than were received on the Democratic side for the President's scheme to repeal the purchasing clause of the act of July 14, 1890, which he himself had been active and efficient and vigorous in imposing upon the American people, and imposing it on them, as was said, so that there might be avoided the responsibility of having a Republican President compelled to veto a free-coinage bill.

The Senator has said that when the Democrats came into power under Mr. Cleveland our revenues fell, that it was not the fault of Republican legislation, but it was the fault of the American people who exercised an undoubted right in electing a President of the United States. I think they made a horrible blunder, Mr. President, when they did that. I thought so then, and I think so yet. We escaped with less evil than I feared we would when Mr. Cleveland went into the White House, but we should have escaped with infinitely less evil if the Republicans had not supported him better than he was supported by his own party.

The act known as the McKinley tariff act was before the Senate a long time, and thoroughly discussed. There were Senators in this body who declared again and again that while some of the rates provided for were outrageously high, while the bill put duties upon some articles which, according to Republican principles, were not necessary, it would not afford sufficient revenue to defray the expenses of the Government.

Mr. President, I do not care who might have been elected President, for if Mr. Harrison had been elected there would have been likewise a deficiency, and I will admit that the deficiency was the primary cause of our difficulties. I mean, of course, with reference to maintaining the redemption fund, as you insist, at $100,000,000, and being prepared at all times with abundant money to redeem paper as it came to us.

I borrowed of the Senator yesterday a paper from which he read, and I wish to read something from it. I want to call attention to the fact that the deficiencies which arose arose because of an improper tariff. Of course I do not know that I ought to say that, because on this side of the Chamber the majority of those who discuss these questions have always insisted that the law did not have anything to do with it; that it was a question of commerce; but you made a statute concerning the import duties, and this was the result: In 1890 you had a surplus of $85,000,000. You had more than that amount in the year preceding and still more in the year before that. The very purpose of the McKinley bill, as it was alleged, was to decrease the revenue and get rid of the surplus, which it was then said was a bad thing to have.

I remember hearing young General Grant say, when he was running for an office over in New York, that it could be demonstrated that a surplus was a great deal better than a deficiency. I thought that was a manifestation of some of his father's horse sense; and I think Senators here will find it is a great deal easier to deal with a surplus than it is with a deficiency. But for the purpose not of paying the public debt, which had been up to about that time a Republican policy, we changed the tariff. True, we changed it in regard to some articles on the tariff list as to which the men who were manufacturing were clamoring for increased tariff duties, which they got. You had $26,000,000 that year. The next year you had less than $10,000,000—$9,914,000, for I am not giving the odd numbers—and the next year you had $2,000,000.

Mr. President, no portion of that decrease of the revenues can be charged to the Democratic Administration, nor can it be charged to the expectation of the election of such an Administration. I will venture to say that the great majority of men dealing with public affairs in the great centers of trade believed to the last minute that the Republican and not the Democratic candidate would be elected.

The next year, that is the year 1894, there was a deficiency of $70,000,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should make a brief statement?

Mr. TELLER. Not at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator must be aware that the large increase of duties which was effected by the McKinley act, so called, had produced very large importations prior to the time that act took effect, and had reduced very greatly the consequent importations subsequent to the passage of the statute. So the revenue for months after that act went into effect fell below the normal amount.

Mr. TELLER. I will admit that. The impression went out that the McKinley bill was to increase tariff duties on very many articles; and it undoubtedly did increase them, as the Senator says. A great many merchants would naturally provide themselves with an extra supply of goods, but I deny that they would provide themselves with a supply sufficient to carry them through all this time, showing a deficiency. I repeat, it can not be denied that there would have been a deficiency under the McKinley bill if Mr. Cleveland had not been elected.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa was asked yesterday what was the deficiency in 1894—and I recall with what unction he announced that it was $70,000,000. Then I remember that there ran around this side of the Senate a smile, as if that was a knock-down argument. I want to say to the Senator that every dollar that was collected that year was collected under the McKinley law, and the Wilson law did not go into effect until long after the close of that fiscal year. I suppose the Senator would come back and say that while, of course, they knew that there was to be a bill to relieve some of those tariff exactions, therefore they ceased to buy. To some extent those statements are true; but they are not true to the extent that it is claimed. A merchant who does business must keep his stock up fresh and new, and no great wholesale dealer in any of the great cities, dependent upon the Western and Central trade, could afford to let his stock run down. The stock is brought up and kept up. There were other things which brought about that condition. One was the hard times then existing in this country.

REDEMPTION OF THE GREENBACK.

Another thing which the Senator dilated upon at great length was as to the fear that the greenback was not to be redeemed in gold. Mr. President, I want to say that I have been a careful observer and there never has been an hour in the United States since January 1, 1879, when the public had any doubt that the greenback would be redeemed in gold. There never has been a commercial transaction that took place in the United States that will justify any man in saying that the people were afraid that the greenback would not be redeemed in gold. There have been great raids made upon the Treasury. The other day a Senator who did not make a speech, in reply to something I had said, stated in substance that the demand for greenbacks created the necessity for a bond issue. Mr. President, I am going to show from indisputable evidence that the demand for bonds was what created the demand for gold and greenbacks. Everybody ought to know that. There was no difficulty whatever until the revenues ran down, until the amount in the Treasury could not be kept there because there were not sufficient revenues. When it became known that Mr. Cleveland intended to reenforce the $100,000,000 of gold reserve by a bond issue, then the demand for gold came, as will be shown by the records. The demand for gold grew, I repeat, out of bond issues, and not because the people of the United States were afraid of the greenbacks.

In 1893 there was a financial panic such as has been seen in this country but once or twice within my recollection. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] yesterday said it was a bond and bank panic. Mr. President, it was a bank panic, assisted by the then President of the United States, who publicly declared it was necessary that the people should have "an object lesson" before they would consent to the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act of 1890. I will not go into that now. In a speech I made here some years ago I presented the evidence that that was a preconcerted bank panic. It got so very violent, so fierce, and so alarming, as I said the other day, that the great banks of the great cities of this country suspended, not specie payments alone, but all payment for a period of more than ninety days, and when anyone went to the banks with his checks the banks gave him clearing-house certificates, which were not money. In all that panic the greenback never failed. It was as good as gold.

The Senator says the people were afraid the greenback would be paid in silver. During the most of that period the silver dollar sold over the brokers' counters in the city of New York for from 3 to 5 per cent more than gold. The same thing was done in other cities, not because the people had more interest in silver than in gold, but because silver was the most convenient money to be used; and, Mr. President, I repeat here from my place that there has never been an hour and there is no commercial act that can be cited to show that the American people doubted that we would redeem the greenback in gold. There was no party in this country after 1879 which was objecting to redeeming it in gold, and there was ample power in the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain it by the issue of bonds. Everybody knew that no man had ever been in the Treasury Department, nor was any man ever likely to be there, who would not see that the law was executed, especially as it was in the interest not only of the Government that the greenback should be so redeemed, but in the interest of the commercial public as well. It would have been a disaster, I think, to have had the Government repudiate its obligations. The Government never has done so, and it is not likely to do so; and I am sorry the Senator did not look a little more carefully into this matter and discover that fact.

Mr. President, I said that I was going to show something about the cause which drew gold out of the Treasury, this endless chain which we hear about, which is being provided for in this bill and is to be a feature of our financial policy hereafter.

TROUBLE OF MAINTAINING THE GOLD STANDARD.

I said the other day—and do not wish to repeat it now for fear of extending my remarks for too great a length, but I am going to advert to it in another way—that no country in the world has gone to a gold standard which did not suffer ills which were very much greater than the benefits derived from such action. One of those ills is the trouble of maintaining the standard after you have adopted it. For fear I may not have an opportunity hereafter, I will say that Italy went to the gold standard by law as many as sixteen or eighteen years ago. She never had the gold standard a minute. She borrowed $80,000,000 in gold and put it into her treasury, but she has never dared to let it all go into circulation to this hour, because if she had done so the demand is so great, she being a debtor nation, that she would have lost it out of her circulation.

Russia attempted to go to the gold standard. Austria-Hungary went to the gold standard in 1872, and has never been able to make it good. Half a dozen other countries are in the same condition. The South American republics undertook to go to the gold standard, and every one of them found itself in a little while without gold. I have the authority of a man which can not be questioned—I think I will put that in now for fear I may not have time to put it in hereafter—Dr. Robert Giffen, of Great Britain, probably the most influential gold monometallist in the world, has written learnedly on this subject. I think I have read everything Dr. Giffen has written. While he is almost a fanatic on the subject of monometallism, and insists that monometallism is to be the rule, yet he says if you can not have gold, you ought to have silver as the single standard, and not bimetallism. I think, after all, he is the fairest minded scientist in Europe on his side. He walks up to the result of his system and admits it. He never has denied the appreciation of gold. He has insisted that it existed. He is living in a community which buys a great deal more than it sells, and he appeals to their cupidity and says "you want cheap products, and the cheaper they are the better for you." Then he figures to show how much they have made by adhering to the gold standard with its low prices.

I want to read an article written by Dr. Giffen in June, 1898, a protest against the establishment of the gold standard in India. Then I will take up the other proposition, which I have left for a moment, as to the withdrawal of gold from our Treasury here.

Dr. Giffen starts out by saying in a letter written to the editor of the London Times:

It is a hard saying to some that a gold standard is impossible for India. The subject has been discussed as if the choice of a money standard were within the unlimited discretion of a government, and as if the only question were the method of acquiring the standard selected. This is not a scientific view. Governments would certainly act wisely at all times in having regard to the economic conditions of their subjects, and their tastes and habits in the matter of currency.

I shall not read it all——

This is the general rationale of the statement so often made in the city that some countries are too poor to have a gold standard. It is not poverty merely that makes the difficulty, but poverty combined with heavy indebtedness. The gold money in such a case steadily tends to go away. The remaining currency, whether of paper or other coin, is then with difficulty convertible into gold, and so the standard is lost.

In this view, it is a great convenience to a debtor country like India, and, in fact, almost a necessity, to have a money different from that of its creditor countries.

I believe the Senator from Nevada said something of that kind yesterday, which I have no doubt everybody who is for this bill will regard as a great heresy.

When the money is different the depression of exchange in the debtor country, which is the result of the competition for bills on the creditor country, lowers the valuation of the money compared with the creditor's money, and thereby the value of all goods in the debtor country compared with the creditor's money. Hence there is a stimulus to the export of those goods which are suitable for the creditor country, and the money of the debtor country is not acted upon at all, although it is one of the first things to be acted on, as we have seen, when the debtor country has the same money as its creditor.

I only read this as bearing upon what I said about the difficulty of establishing the gold standard. I think myself there is a little bit of heresy in a part of that quotation, but I hesitate to say so against such high gold authority.

Hence the debtor country, with a different money from that of the creditor country, is able to retain that money in spite of its poverty and the adverse exchange; and the mischief of a contracted money market due to normal exchange operations is spared it.

There are many cases in point of countries in an economic position resembling that of India, but perhaps not so poor, which have attempted a gold standard, but have failed. A conspicuous case in my own recollection is that of Italy, which issued a gold loan about fifteen years ago and obtained £16,000,000 in order to introduce a gold standard, but failed of success. The gold standard was never really effective, or was so for so short a period as hardly to be noticeable, and the standard is long since gone.

Within the last week I saw in a financial paper a statement that they had never dared to put out a large amount of that money because they knew the minute they put it out it would be exported, and the Government would be distressed.

The Argentine Republic, again, has twice failed; Brazil and Chile have failed; Spain has failed: Austria and Russia failed to keep a metallic standard of silver for similar reasons. Some of the countries named are once more renewing the attempt at a gold standard, and Japan is a new beginner in the same line; but, unless one or more of them prove to be unexpectedly rich—and Japan, for instance, is rich for the moment—the attempt is no more than an experiment, and we are justified in saying it is far from certain to succeed.

As I write Japan is said to be proposing a new loan of £15,000,000 to relieve the depression. There is nothing, then, to weaken the force of the lesson which all these failures teach us. A gold standard is not an easy thing for a poor and indebted country with its creditors also possessing that standard. The chances are that even very costly attempts will not succeed.

Since Dr. Giffen wrote that article Chile has gone back to the silver standard or attempted to do so; she has been on a paper standard of irredeemable paper, to which nearly all the South American countries have brought themselves by their foolish attempt to imitate the great, rich country of Great Britain and have a gold standard.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator without his permission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think the Senator will admit that we are not a poor country; but does he say we are a debtor country?

Mr. TELLER. That we are a debtor country can not be denied. There is no country in the world that owes as much as we owe. We owe largely to ourselves. I ought to except France. The French Government owes, but the people do not owe to each other as we do.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] the other day made a statement showing how much our net exports had been in eleven years and how little gold had come back. I wish to say to the Senator from Connecticut that there is no evidence that our securities have been coming back any faster than they have been going. Just before the close of Mr. Harrison's Administration it was semiofficially announced at least that in one single month a hundred millions of our securities had gone to Europe. We know it to be a fact that one of the great bankers of New York City, about the close of that Administration, went to Europe with gilt-edged securities to sell in order to get money to keep the business of the country from being unusually and unpleasantly depressed.

REDEMPTION AGAIN.

Mr. President, I wish to get back to the question of greenback redemptions. I read from the report of the present Secretary of the Treasury for 1899. This is one of the cases where I think you can rely upon the report of the Secretary, because he is not allowed to draw on his imagination, but he has to deal with the stubborn record facts. The Senator from Iowa was dealing with the Administration of President Cleveland and the question of the fright of the American people about greenbacks. I do not wonder that the Senator, not having perhaps looked at this, repeated that statement, because all the great public press of this country during that panic asserted again and again that the whole thing was occasioned by fright and the fear that we would go to a silver basis, and therefore people hoarded not only gold but greenbacks and silver certificates and silver dollars. If they had been afraid that we were going to the silver basis, there would have been nothing but gold that they would have hoarded.

I will give the redemptions from March, 1893, to June, 1893, both inclusive. That was during Mr. Cleveland's Administration. The redemptions were $40,850,410. From July to the following January, inclusive, the redemptions were $5,810,502. That is the time that the panic was rife. That is the time when the Senator said the difficulty was created because the people were afraid of greenbacks. In a less length of time before the panic became rife they had taken $40,000,000 out of the Treasury, and then they took five or practically six millions afterwards.

In February, 1894, and down to June, 1894, both inclusive, there was drawn out of the Treasury $79,000,000; and if the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], who I think rather indicated one day that he thought the Treasury was depleted because the people wanted gold for other purposes than bond buying, will look, he will find that on the 17th day of January of that year the President of the United States gave notice that he was about to sell a lot of bonds which would be paid for in gold. Thereupon the people went to the Treasury with their greenbacks to get gold with which to buy bonds, and in January there was $356,356, and from July down to that time there had not been a month that had more than $2,348,000. I stated that the whole of it was less than $6,000,000. But in that month, February, there was $19,193,354 drawn out of the Treasury. What was that drawn for? It was drawn for the purpose of buying these bonds which the people had been notified were to be put upon the market.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Were not those the months in which we had the greatest exportations of gold?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will please observe the rule and address the Chair when he desires to interrupt a Senator.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I will ask the Chair for permission to interrupt the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; I always yield.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The question I wish to ask is this: Were not those the very months in which our greatest exportations of gold occurred?

Mr. TELLER. I expected that question, because I have become pretty well accustomed to our friends questioning all our statements and thus trying to find a hole to get out through. Right here from the same authority I will give our exports of gold for that month. Our imports were $2,140,982 and our exports were $3,209,000, or about a million dollars net exports. I think the Senator from Connecticut is answered, but I will answer him as I go along with the other months. He will see that there is no foundation for the statement that the gold was withdrawn for export, although that is the usual demand upon the Treasury for gold. It is for exportation, I will admit. It always has been before and it always will be when an exportation of gold is to be made.

When was the next bond issue?

Mr. ALLISON. November.

Mr. TELLER. November, 1894. The notice was given that the bonds would be issued and paid for some time afterwards. There were in the month of May $26,541,082 of redemptions, and there were in June $22,169,893 of redemptions. There is nearly $50,000,000 in two months. However, I will be able to show the Senator heavier redemptions than that.

Now I will answer the Senator, and perhaps this will satisfy him. There was an import of gold of $4,282,743, but against that there was an export of gold of $27,400,000. It is fair to say that at that time that probably was largely for export, and the next month was probably largely for export also. I think these depletions of gold from the banks necessarily would have had a tendency to cause some of the banks to go to the Treasury. A part of it may have been taken from that. A part of the exports probably went from our new gold, because the new gold generally goes abroad in bars rather than in coin.

Mr. SPOONER. What were the exports in July?

Mr. TELLER. This brings us down to July, 1895. The exports were, as I said, twenty-seven million and twenty-three million, respectively. That was the time of this great redemption—May and June.

On November 14, 1894, a proclamation was made for another issue of bonds—mind you, this was in 1894. Did the Senator from Wisconsin ask for July? I will give it to the Senator. July following there was nearly fourteen millions of redemptions.

Mr. ALLISON. July, 1894?

Mr. TELLER. July, 1894. Then the next month there was less than five millions; the next less than a million; next month three millions, in round numbers; and the next nearly eight millions. December, after this call was made, it was $31,907,221. Against that there was a net export of about nine and a half millions of gold.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that January?

Mr. TELLER. That is in December, 1894. In January the redemptions were $45,117,838 and the imports were a million and a quarter, in round numbers, and the exports were pretty nearly twenty-six millions of gold.

Mr. ALLISON. January, 1895?

Mr. TELLER. January, 1895; and the imports were about a million and a quarter and the exports nearly twenty-six millions. Then the redemptions fell practically to comparatively nothing for the balance of the year, the next month, February, being five millions.

Mr. ALLISON. What about exports?

Mr. TELLER. The exports fell off, too. I will read them to the Senator to illustrate it. In February there was $5,560,902, and our imports of gold were $5,632,197, and the net exports were about a million and a half. The next month the redemptions were, in round numbers, about a million, and the imports of gold ran up to $7,246,000. I do not give exact figures. It is not worth while.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Half of the loan which the Senator is speaking of, made about that time, or before that time, was placed abroad in gold.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; it was supposed to be. It is said—I do not know whether it is true—that the people shipped the gold over there and paid it over there. That was a current rumor. It may be that it was a slander. Possibly this seven millions was what they got. The exports that month were about $3,126,000, and then each month from that down the imports were considerably larger than the exports and the redemptions were about a million a month.

We had another bond issue. On January 6, 1896, another circular was issued for a hundred millions of bonds, and in that fiscal year the redemptions were $158,659,956, but $82,503,440 was in the last half of that year. That is, after January, 1896, speaking of the fiscal year and not the calendar year. On January 6, 1896, the circular was issued. During that month the redemptions were $16,448,508. The next month, February, $21,736,876, and in March $6,856,546. For January, 1896, we had a net export of gold of only about $200,000. I am not trying to be exact. For the next month we had a net import of gold of somewhere in the neighborhood of $9,000,000. In March the imports of gold exceeded by about $300,000 the exports.

Mr. President, I believe there can be no question but that those redemptions were largely the work of the people who wanted to buy bonds, and that will be the way, and it will always be easy to secure bonds whenever they want them, by simply making a raid upon the Treasury and then getting up a fright and then having the bonds issued. I know it was said yesterday by the Senator from Iowa that he did not believe there would be any issue of bonds. I speak with some hesitation upon that point because I have not before me the RECORD containing his speech; but that is a matter of opinion, and, of course, is not worth very much. I think you will find a decided intention to make raids upon the Treasury from time to time when the great moneyed interests of the country, who want to put their holdings into bonds, wish that class of security. It is the best security in the world. If a man had bought bonds in 1873 and held them he would have made more money than he could have made by any investment which it was possible for the human mind to conceive of. He would have a property which has not depreciated. Anything else he might have bought has depreciated.

UNREALIZED PROPHECIES.

There has been a good deal said about the failure of our prophecies. I shall not speak at length upon it. We did prophesy some evils from the gold standard that have not come true; but we did not prophesy as many about the gold standard that did not come true as our friends have about silver which have failed of realization.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the Senator leaves the question of redemptions, I should be glad to call his attention to the fact that since the 1st of January, 1879, a period of about twenty-two years, there have been redeemed only $545,000,000 of greenbacks, or about one and three-fifths times the amount outstanding.

Mr. TELLER. What significance does the Senator attach to that?

Mr. ALLISON. I attach very great significance to that fact.

Mr. TELLER. I will hear the Senator on that point.

Mr. ALLISON. I attach this significance to it, that in times of content as respects the condition of our finances and the condition of the country there is practically no redemption of greenbacks, and it is only in times such as he has described, when there are enormous and abnormal exportations of gold, and, if you please to add, the sale of bonds, that these redemptions take place.

Mr. TELLER. I agree with that statement. The difficulty in maintaining the gold standard wherever it has been attempted is not because of trouble at home, not because there is a premium on gold—and I am going to touch on that point before I get through, but not now—because of the demand for gold for export; whenever gold is required for export the demand is made on the Treasury by presenting greenbacks for redemption. It is the struggle the world is making to get gold.

I wish to say a word about these prophecies. I recall very well when the measure known as the Bland-Allison bill was before the Senate, largely engineered and supported and put through by the aid and under the advice of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], against the absolute conviction of a good many of us that it was not a wise method of settling the question, when there was a divergence between gold and silver of only 8 per cent—I think that is right——

Mr. ALLISON. Eight or nine.

Mr. TELLER. Eight or nine. I am firmly of the opinion myself that if we had gone to free coinage then there would have been no trouble whatever to secure the cooperation of France, and if France had not cooperated with us we, with our great wealth, could have maintained the parity between the two metals absolutely. We would have established it in an hour. But the Senator from Vermont, who is not with us now, who was then chairman of the Committee on Finance, standing in this Chamber, I remember, said that if we adopted the Bland-Allison bill the Government of the United States would never sell another bond, or if it did sell more bonds it would be at an extravagant rate of interest. I recall that the President of the United States vetoed that bill with a declaration that it was unwise and that it would bring us into trouble. I recall that the Secretary of the Treasury stated before a House committee and in his annual report of that year that not more than $50,000,000 could be coined before there would be a depreciated silver dollar.

What was the result? Not a prediction that was made in the great public press against it (and all the great press of the country was against it), not a prediction made in this Chamber (and there were a great many against it), not a prediction made from the White House or the Treasury Department, ever came true. We entered upon a period of prosperity that we have not had since. When it ceased, as it did some years ago, we have never been able to return to it, and with all your boasted prosperity you have not got where you were a year after we passed the Bland-Allison bill. They said we would not coin any gold. We heard that in this Chamber. In the next five years we coined within a trifle as much gold as we had coined in the ten preceding years, and gold, which had been a stranger to the great majority of the people, to men who had grown up and had never seen a gold coin, was seen by them in abundance in circulation with the silver dollar, and the two at an absolute parity.

PARITY OF GOLD AND SILVER.

I stated the other day that there never was an hour from the time the first silver dollar came from the mint till I was speaking when there had been any divergence in value between the silver dollar and the gold dollar; that the Treasury paid out the silver dollar as they paid out gold, and that the $167,000,000 of it, either as dollars or as silver certificates, had gone out in circulation for an equal amount of gold carried to the Treasury and put in there for the purpose of getting that which they preferred to gold, and that was silver. So not a single suggestion ever came true, and no man living can stand up and show that any evil influence whatever followed that act. On the contrary, everything grew better. We had been sending gold abroad and losing it for sixteen straight years and the tide turned with the passage of that act, and that year we got a small net import of gold and we continued it to a degree that no nation has ever had before. The imports were so great our exports increased. There was prosperity everywhere, and it continued to a very large degree until there was the bank panic of which I have spoken.

In 1893 we made some predictions of what would happen. We were making our fight against the destruction of silver as money upon the theory enunciated by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] yesterday with such great force, a theory that the scientific men of the world never doubted nor questioned until prejudice and passion compelled them to belie history and science and declare that the quantitative theory was not a correct one. We were saying, You are destroying a part of the money, and if you destroy it there is not gold enough to take its place.

We were justified, Mr. President. Gold had been decreasing year by year for many years. Nobody knew that the great gold fields of Africa would produce what they are producing. Nobody knew that Cripple Creek, an extent of territory not much bigger than the District of Columbia, would produce $20,000,000 in a year, with a fair prospect of doubling it the next year. Nobody knew that Klondike would send us down twenty-five or thirty million dollars of gold and with a prospect of sending us three or four times that amount. Nobody believed that the gold product of the world would go to $300,000,000? You who contended for the destruction of silver money declared over and over again that there was gold enough and you did not want any more.

COCIRCULATION OF GOLD AND SILVER.

Mr. President, I pass that. I want to just touch for a few minutes on the proposition so often made, and made with so much ex cathedra authority. This is it: You can not circulate gold and silver together. I have heard it asserted here and I have heard it elsewhere, there is not a gold-standard advocate in this country who does not repeat it, that you can not circulate gold and silver together. It is an old saying that what has been done can be done. As Dr. Johnson said, the test of truth is experience. The experience of the world will justify me in saying that for hundreds of years—nay, Mr. President, for thousands of years—the two metals have traveled side by side, doing money duty, as they were fixed by law, not subject to the whims and caprice of men, not subject to the ever-changing affairs of commercial life, but fixed there by law, fixed there as early as fifteen hundred years before the Christian era in India, fixed from time to time ever since, sometimes at one ratio and sometimes at another, but always tied together by law. England circulated for many years gold and silver together; France circulated them together; all Europe that was bimetallic circulated them, and we circulated them.

Mr. President, I have heard again and again that our relation of gold and silver at 15 to 1 had a tendency to drive out the gold. We had as much gold in circulation in this country from 1792 to 1835 as we had silver. We had the world's gold. We had a law that took in the coin of all mankind, both gold and silver, and they continued to circulate here, not alternately, not one time gold and another silver, but together, and we made no export of gold to amount to anything until 1820. That is a fact established by the report of the Director of the Mint in 1835. There was not much attention paid to keeping a list of exports, etc.

I have stated that the gold circulated in France. I want to make this statement, and if any Senator will ever call on me at any time I will prove to him by the documents which I have not time to read, that there never was an hour in France when there was not all the gold that the commercial interests of France required and all the silver that the commercial interests required; and that there never was in the purchasing power, in the domestic relations of France, the slightest variation between silver and gold. And yet during all that time, from the very commencement of this century up to 1842, there was a premium on gold in France, a premium on gold in England, and a premium on gold in the United States. But it was a premium for export. It was because there was a demand for gold to go abroad and not an extra demand for gold for domestic purposes, and no premium in either country on gold in circulation; but the broker who collected the gold for export got a premium when he sold it.

We had a premium on gold here, and yet I defy any man to find a scintilla of evidence to justify him in saying that at any time a gold dollar would buy any more than a silver dollar. A part of the time while gold fell the silver dollar was so valuable that it traveled abroad, where it was better appreciated.

In August, 1877, the French minister of finance made an investigation into the circulation of silver coins in France, and it appeared that out of 824,987 5-franc pieces 517,700 had been coined before 1851. This is 62 per cent of the coins examined, and if this holds good as to the entire stock of 5-franc pieces, there is in circulation in France 300,000,000 French dollars, or about 30 per cent of all the 5-franc pieces coined since 1795.

Now, the repeated statements that gold would not circulate with silver are contradicted by unquestioned facts of history. Many writers assumed that because there was a premium on gold there was a divergence between the gold money of France and the silver money, and so without looking into the matter they fell into that error.

In 1833 the Director of the United States Mint, Samuel Moore, making his report in speaking of the resumption of specie payments in England in 1820 and the mint regulations in England as to silver coinage, said:

> The above principles of coinage were adopted in England in 1816, and on the resumption of specie payments, in 1820, were carried into full effect and became thereafter the controlling principle of their metallic currency. From that period the gold coins of the United States have been in demand for exportation at a premium variable in amount, but always sufficient to withdraw them from circulation.
> The average relative value of gold and silver in England was found, during a period of twelve years, from 1821 to 1832, inclusive, to be 15.77 to 1. The average relative value of gold and silver in France during seven years ending with 1832 was 15.68 to 1. The average relative value of gold and silver in the United States from 1821 to 1832 was 15.63 to 1.
> It appears, therefore, that the proposed ratio of 15.625 to 1 is exceedingly near to the actual relative value of gold and silver in the United States, arising from whatever cause, during the whole interval since 1821, inclusive, when first a premium for gold above its legal value in our coins began to attract observation. The error of this ratio, moreover, if there be an error, is on the side of safety, to be corrected by a further advance, if the result should be found to justify it.
> No purpose is presumed to be entertained of changing in any degree the standard measure of value residing in our silver coins—the acknowledged basis of contracts. * * *
> Whatever may be the decision of political economists as to the expediency of making both gold and silver a legal tender for all amounts, or the further question, Which of the two metals is the preferable standard of value?—since it is generally conceded that, in effect, there can be but one—these principles have been long settled in the United States. Both gold and silver have during the existence of the Government been a general legal tender, while silver alone has been the standard of value familiar in our conception of price. Any modification of the gold coinage will be safe which shall leave this standard of value undisturbed, and none could be contemplated without concern which would impair it.
> The design entertained, therefore, in the change of ratio now proposed is that silver shall remain the basis of our currency and the controlling standard of value; that gold shall be, as at present, a legal tender for all amounts, but estimated in such a proportion to silver that the former will be exported by a slight preference when occasional circumstances shall induce the export of a portion of the national coins.

In December, 1830, the House of Representatives appointed a committee to consider various financial questions, among which was one to make silver the only legal-tender money between individuals, but to make gold legal tender to the Government, but not otherwise.

Mr. C. P. White was chairman, and on the 30th of June, 1832, he made a partial report. Among other things, the committee said:

> Silver is the ancient currency of the United States, the metal in which the money unit is exhibited, the money generally used in foreign commerce, and that description of the precious metal in the distribution of which we exercise an extensive agency. The committee upon due consideration of all the attendant circumstances are of the opinion that the standard of value ought to be legally and exclusively, as it is practically, regulated by silver.

In the report of the committee made March 17, 1832, they declared—

> That no gold of consequence was exported from the United States from 1792 to 1821.

Also—

> That there were certainly no indications that gold was rated too low in our standard of 1 to 15 earlier than 1821, when the English demand commenced.

Mr. President, I do not want to extend my remarks beyond the time allotted, although I might be tempted to do so if no one else wanted to speak. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the financial condition of the world from the Mint Report of 1832.

Director of the Mint Samuel Moore, in his report to the Speaker of the House of Representatives according to law, January 11, 1832, reports:

> In obedience to the resolutions of the House of Representatives of December 14 requiring the Director of the Mint to report to the House, as far as in his power, the present relative value of gold and silver bullion in the principal countries of Europe and the United States, that is to say, If 371.25 grains of pure silver are worth $1, what is the worth of the same weight of pure gold?

Among other things, speaking of the legal ratio established in 1792, he said:

> No deficiency, however, in the mint ratio of gold to silver in the United States became early apparent. Gold and silver remained at par with each other throughout that period.

Meaning from 1792 to 1821.

> Both were the object of a premium measured in the actual currency during the suspension of specie payments, but both of the same premium. The first notice of a premium on gold measured in silver in the United States appears late in 1821.
>
> The effective return to specie payments in the United States occurred between 1817 and 1819 and in England about the year 1820. To these considerations are especially to be added the new mint regulations of the latter, adopted in 1816, but only carried into full effect about the year 1821, which appeared to have exerted a very sensible control over the relative values of gold and silver in the bullion market.
> From the peculiarity in the coinage of Great Britain, which, though authorized by law in 1816, was not in such effective operation as to test its ultimate influence until 1821, probably resulted more directly than from any other cause the advance in gold in the United States, which began to be observed in that year. In order to fulfill the requisition of a resolution of Parliament of 1819 for the restoration of the currency, as appears from the published reports, an amount of gold equal to about $95,000,000 was required to be imported within the succeeding four years. This operation, which was accomplished, could not fail to be sensibly felt in the United States, intimately connected as they are by commercial intercourse with England, and setting a value on gold in proportion to silver lower than other nations from which this supply was to be drawn.
> It was accordingly felt in a premium on gold paid first in 1821. The expanded currency of England and the continued demand for gold resulting from her exclusive regulations in regard to silver, together with her extensive intercourse with the United States, may be regarded as exercising a constant influence to maintain the premium on gold, which from that period to the present time has not ceased in this country, though subject to many fluctuations in its amounts.
> It would appear from his report that while there is a premium on gold in the United States there was also a premium on gold in both England and France, for he says:
> "On the whole it may be assumed that the relative value of gold and silver bullion in Europe may, as far as regards the United States, be sought for in England and France; that in the former the relative value at the present time may be estimated at about 15.85 to 1, being equivalent to a premium on our ratio of 5¼ per cent: that in France the relative value may be estimated at about 15.73 to 1, which is equivalent to a premium on our ratio of 4¼ per cent."
> In the United States the relative value of gold and silver at the present time may be estimated at about 15.65 to 1, corresponding to a premium of 4 per cent on our present mint ratio.

The Mint report for 1898 says that our stock of gold has increased from July 1, 1897, to November, 1898, $228,800,000.

France had increased her gold from January 1, 1897, to January 1, 1898, $38,000,000.

Russia had increased her stock of gold from January 1, 1897, to January 1, 1898, $169,700,000.

The Austro-Hungarian Empire increased its stock of gold from January 1, 1897, to January 1, 1898, $49,200,000.

Germany, during the calendar year 1897, increased her stock of gold $140,000,000.

The South American nations increased their stock of gold during 1897 $12,500,000.

Making a total gain in all these countries of $638,200,000.

The increase of $228,800,000 for the period given from July, 1897, to November, 1898, is one year and two months, but the rest of the countries are for one year.

The production of gold in all the world for 1897 was $237,000,000—for 1898, $287,000,000.

Take the production for 1897 at	$237,000,000
For four months of 1898 at	95,750,000
And you have	332,750,000

or about one-half of the accumulation of the countries above named.

The Director of our Mint says Russia has in ten years accumulated $500,000,000 of gold "in pursuance of her purpose to establish her monetary system on a gold basis."

Now, Mr. President, everything everywhere indicates that there is not enough gold, even with this great output, to meet demands.

From 1800 to 1850 the production of the world's gold was 38,093,570 ounces, and the production of silver was one thousand and fifty-two million ounces, in round numbers. Now, this is the ratio of 27.61 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold. From 1820 to 1850 the production of gold was 125,581,280 ounces and of silver 68,187,910 ounces. This is the ratio of 5.41, and yet during that time there was no material difference, and it has not made any difference through time whether silver was produced, as it was sometimes, almost 100 per cent more than at others, and then gold produced. No disturbance between the ratio established by law ever took place until that law was destroyed.

SILVER MONEY IN ENGLAND.

Mr. President, I am not going to go into that except to say, as I said the other day, that silver had been the money of the world, and it was the money of Great Britain, even with her gold standard. While Great Britain was carrying on her wars from 1805 to 1810, the paymaster-general of Great Britain purchased and sent abroad £5,826,106, of which £5,541,562 was silver, £284,604 gold, and £504 copper.

I take this from the bullion committee's report that I have here, which I intended to read from if I had had the time. I hope Senators will just follow these figures. That amount was to pay the army and to support their allies; and of that amount, as before pointed out, £5,541,562 sterling was silver and £284,604 of gold—that is in the five years from 1805 to 1810. This he purchased in open market.

Mr. ALDRICH. That was before the gold standard was established.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; but practically the gold standard was established in 1793. They attempted it because they limited the use of silver. They used it by weight for transactions above a certain amount, because of the abraded condition of the silver coin.

He also received otherwise than by purchase and sent abroad £5,329,607, of which amount £121,756 was gold, leaving a balance of silver of £5,807,851. Or, taking the total sent abroad, it was £11,755,713 of silver and only £406,360 of gold, or, in a total of $58,778,565, only $2,031,800 was gold. That went to every part of the world. I use that to show that when they needed anything of that kind to pay out as they paid it to the army, gold was not any better than silver, and silver was as good as gold.

Mr. President, notwithstanding they went to the gold standard in 1816, or attempted to do so, the authority is that during all of that time their banks handled more silver than any other banks in the world. They sent to Europe—I mean to the Continent—they sent to India, and they sent to us and to everybody else more or less silver that they received in the course of their trade.

Mr. President, if I had time I should like to take up some other points, but I do not think I will talk longer.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator can go on for ten minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado has until ten minutes past 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator has until ten minutes past 2.

Mr. TELLER. Very well; I will go on until that time.

DEBATE USELESS.

I am going to quit without saying a good many things that ought to be said in this debate. I know how useless this debate is; I know that it falls on deaf and hardened ears; that the party in power has determined that this shall be done, not, as I said the other day, because of the public demand, for none has been made, but because the great agencies that control to-day the political affairs of this country have decreed that this should happen.

Mr. President, I dislike to bring any railing accusation against this great political organization, yet I feel that I should be untrue to myself if I did not say here, as I have stated elsewhere, that, in my judgment, the Republican party has abandoned its great fundamental principle of "the greatest good to the greatest number." It is not the party to-day that it was in its youth. It is not so old that it ought to die of decay; but, Mr. President, it has fallen into evil hands and under evil influences, and, in my judgment, there is no hope for a distressed and afflicted country from it. I do not believe that the agencies which control it will allow it to stand for righteousness and justice, as it once stood. Its policies will be dictated not from the heart and from the conscience of its membership, but from the great commercial center, overborne and weighed down with greed.

Mr. President, I can not forget that this party has stood for justice and righteousness; I can not forget that it was organized and that it came into existence as a protest against slavery of white men and black men alike; I can not forget that it stood for years for all that was good in government, recognizing its obligation to the people and not to the wealth of the country.

I regret that I am compelled to say now that I believe it has abandoned its great mission and no longer intends to stand for the common man, for what Mr. Lincoln used to call the plain people, the people who are the hope of the Republic, if there is hope for it, as I believe there is, but it is with them and not with the rich, not with the great, but with the men who toil and who suffer much.

Mr. President, I am tempted to read before I quit the declaration of a great Frenchman that speaks so rightly my sentiments. It was read in the Senate by a former distinguished Senator from New York, Mr. Evarts. I have read it again and again in the reports of the conference of 1881. An old man, 84 years old, who had been a leading scientist of the world, who had been on a monetary commission more than fifty years before that time and had rendered great service to monetary science by his report, in his full vigor, standing before that convention, as Senator Evarts declared he did, uttered these words. I commend them to you. If they were right in France they are right here. Its sentiments ought to actuate all men in a republic. Let me read them, Mr. President. At the close of a great speech before the conference, he said:

To recapitulate: There are in all countries hills and plains. As to the hills I have no concern about them; they demand gold, let us give them the satisfaction of handling handsful of it if they will or can; they will always find their interests satisfied. What touch and interest me are the plains—extensive, covered with an abundant population—a population which labors, lives on little, can be poor, can be frugal, and has need of money suited to it. It is for its sake that I demand the maintenance of that silver money—legal tender within, international without—which I consider not only as the money of the middle class in its daily needs, but of the artisan, of the laborer, of the part of the nation the most interesting, the most considerable, and the most worthy of interest.

For its sake, I repeat, I dread to see silver disappear, to see it lose its paying power, pass to a degraded state in public opinion, because everything in that direction will be suffering for it, without being an enjoyment for the elevated part of the population so often spoken of as representing civilization, culture, wealth, power. No; the wealth of a country, its importance, its power, are not on the summits. They have their home below also in that population that labors, that produces, that saves, and for which gold is so often a chimera and silver the daily bread and the safeguard for the morrow.

Mr. President, it is for those people that we plead. It is for them that I am concerned. The rich will take care of themselves. They need none of our aid.

I alluded a moment ago to this great Republican organization with which I attached myself in my youth. I went into it when it carried a lone banner. I went into it when there were few men in it. I went into it because its banner carried that eternal principle of liberty, equality under the law.

The Senator from New York may put upon the Republican banner, and his party may float it in the sky, the words "Gold and Glory." The people will not forget that these words have never been the rallying cry of freemen, but have ever been the rallying cry of the despot. Oh, you may put "Gold and Glory" on your banner and you may glory over it. But you will bring to it none of that enthusiasm, none of that real, true glory that covered you as with a mantle when you put upon your flag Equality, Liberty, Justice, Homes for the Free, Free Speech and Free Men.

Mr. President, the people will take down that banner with its "Gold and Glory," and they will put on it "Righteousness, Justice, and Attention to the wants of the people," and with it will come a demand for such legislation as shall give to all the suffering men of the country equality before the law—and even-handed justice; that shall say it is not the mission of this great people to legislate for a few but to legislate for all, and that you can not close the door of opportunities to some and open it to others without abandoning the great mission of the Republic; and when that time comes the Republican party, Mr. President, will go down to merited defeat and disgrace.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the question before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The financial bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I mean what is the pending question on the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the substitute offered by the Committee on Finance, but for purposes of amendment the bill and the substitute are open as two questions, and a motion to amend the portion to be stricken out will take precedence.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to add to the amendment reported in the form of a new section by the Committee on Finance the words which I send to the desk.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will permit the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance to be first disposed of.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to amend it.

Mr. ALDRICH. It can be amended at any time after it is put into the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am in favor of it, but I should like to amend it first by putting in the words which I propose, if the Senator has no objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. I sought to obtain the floor for the purpose of asking that the amendment to which the Senator refers, which was reported by me from the Committee on Finance on the 6th instant, might, by unanimous consent, be considered as section 9 of the substitute reported from the committee as an amendment to the House bill. Then it will be open to such amendment or alteration as any Senator may see fit to propose.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the amendment submitted by the Committee on Finance on the 6th instant be made section 9 of the original substitute, and may be treated with that for amendment as the original text. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not understand the effect of that. Is the request of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] that this proposed committee amendment shall become a part of the bill by unanimous consent?

Mr. ALDRICH. No; part of the substitute. It will then be open to amendment under our agreement.

Mr. TELLER. We want it treated as an amendment, so that we can amend it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CHANDLER (to Mr. TELLER). You can move to strike it out again, I understand.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Would not this be the addition of a section to the substitute?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is what the Senator from Rhode Island asks.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To be treated as the original text for purposes of amendment. That is to obviate the objection to an amendment in the second degree.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is all.

Mr. CHANDLER. A motion to strike out could immediately be made under that agreement?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is giving the amendment all of the advantages which the original substitute has.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask that the amendment may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the Committee on Finance will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 9. That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism, provided the same be secured by concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think, that being a proposition to add to the pending bill, it had better go as a proposed amendment, and let it be taken up as any other amendment which may be offered to the substitute.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will suggest to the Senator from Arkansas if that course is adopted it will only be open to amendment in the first degree.

Mr. TELLER. We do not want to amend it at all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not suppose there will be any trouble about amending it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have an idea that some Senators would like to express their sentiments about the adding of the words which have been read to the pending substitute.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the course I have suggested would not cut off any Senator from discussing it as he pleases.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think it would be better to have it go into the substitute, if it goes in at all, by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I move to amend the amendment by adding what I send to the desk.

Mr. ALDRICH. The amendment which I reported from the committee is considered as before the Senate?

Mr. CHANDLER. It must be before the Senate. The Senator has moved it, and I move to add to that amendment what I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] to the amendment proposed by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment reported by the committee it is proposed to add:

And that the provisions of the act of March 3, 1897, authorizing the President to appoint commissioners to any international conference called by the United States or any other country with a view to securing by international agreement a fixity of relative value between gold and silver as money by means of a common ratio between these metals, with free mintage at such ratio, be, and the same are hereby, reenacted and continued in force.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TELLER. Are we to vote on that now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. We hope to dispose of all these amendments to-day.

Mr. TELLER. Dispose of all of the amendments?

Mr. ALDRICH. The question now pending, I will suggest to the Senator from Colorado, is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TELLER. We do not know what that is.

Mr. ALDRICH. It has just been read at the desk.

Mr. STEWART. Before any vote is taken on that, I shall want to hear it discussed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is open to discussion.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is open to discussion; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to hear the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment reported by the committee.

The Secretary again read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the act which the Senator recites in the amendment is now in force beyond any question; it has not been repealed, but I assume we do not intend to reenact all the laws which are now upon the statute book.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the first ten lines of this bill Senators contend are nothing but a reenactment of existing law. That is the argument. It is said that it is necessary to reiterate this for some purpose, and now the committee bring in an amendment declaring that they will place no obstacles in the way of international bimetallism. Then, I simply move to add that the provisions of that law are reenacted and continued in force.

Mr. ALDRICH. We propose——

Mr. CHANDLER. Wait a moment.

If one declaration, a declaration for the gold standard, which is the existing law, is to be reiterated, and the declaration is to be made that no obstacle is to be placed in the way of international bimetallism, then there should be added a reenactment or a continuance, as an expression of Congress, of the law providing for an international monetary conference.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, before the Senator from New Hampshire sits down, I desire to make a suggestion to him. I think there is not in his breast, or in the mind of any Senator here, the slightest doubt that the law which is included in the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, which is a law conferring authority upon the President to attempt an international settlement of this question, is still in force, being the existing law. I want to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that if in the course of the voting upon these amendments—which sometimes assume a political bearing and sometimes do not—the amendment of which of course I am in favor, and which, it is not disputed, is still upon our statute books, should be voted down, I want to ask him if he does not feel that he is imperiling a very wise and beneficent and possibly a very useful law which is now upon our statute books?

Of course I shall vote to reenact it as often as it comes up, but I should see it brought up with regret on an occasion like this, when we are voting on amendments to this currency measure, when party alignments are taking place and all matters reported by the committee are apt to be naturally viewed with favor by certain members upon one side of the Chamber and with disfavor by others; but I should regret extremely to see the possibility of the presence of that statute upon the statute books and the possibility of its continuance imperiled by any vote upon it which might receive a negative answer from any Senator in this Chamber. If there was any doubt as to the existence of the law, it would be different; but I understand nobody questions its existence.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the true way of avoiding any such inference as the Senator from Colorado suggests would be drawn from voting down this declaration of existing law, would be to put it into the bill. Are there to be no amendments made to this bill except such as the committee prepare? Is the text of this bill to be considered as a sacred subject in the hands of the Finance Committee, so that the idea of the committee can not be made more perfect and more complete by amendments proposed upon the floor of the Senate? If this is existing law, there can be no harm in reenacting it. I base my amendment upon the ground that the declaration of the committee is that the first ten lines of this bill are nothing but existing law. Not a Senator has pretended that what is contained within these lines is new law.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from New Hampshire himself denied it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a further question. Suppose it to be a fact—I hope it is not—but suppose it to be a fact that Senators who voted to put this law upon the statute book believe that now, if the attempt is made, it is not at this time opportune to enact again a law or reaffirm a law out of which they may believe for the present the usefulness has departed. Is not the Senator imperiling the whole existence and throwing a cloud upon the title of the existing statute by offering the amendment which he has proposed? If it should have the misfortune to be voted down, all of us who believe that out of it some good may come will be injured in the house of our friends. I do hope the Senator will not press his amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I am very sorry to decline to comply with the request of the Senator from Colorado; but I am unable to discover any reason why I should. If the amendment of the Senate Committee on Finance has been proposed in good faith, then they will in equal good faith consent to the continuance of the law providing for an international monetary commission.

I am not aware that I have denied that the first section of this bill is existing law. The Senator from Rhode Island says I have denied it. It is a reiteration of the gold standard, Senators say, and I agree to that; but I say that whenever there is a reiteration of a statutory declaration in favor of the gold standard, there ought to go along with it an unequivocal declaration in favor of the remonetization of silver by international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as will preserve the parity between the coins of the two metals.

Mr. President, my idea is a clear one and a perfectly consistent one. The proposition of the Senator from Colorado is, however, that the Republicans in the Senate must take just so much of that idea as the Finance Committee choose to report in the form of an amendment, and must not vote to make the idea complete by an amendment of the character I have offered.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado tell me when it has got to be a fact or a legal proposition that can be sustained that the refusal of this body to pass an amendment repeals an existing law?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I never said that.

Mr. TILLMAN. You are contending, or at least I understand your proposition to be, that if this amendment, which is now the existing law, is not adopted, it will imperil the law or act as a repeal of it?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, no; that is not what I said.

Mr. TILLMAN. That was the logical deduction from your contention.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It may have been the logic of the Senator from South Carolina, but I did not intend it so.

I will say to the Senator with great frankness that this was a law passed in 1897, providing that whenever the President, in his opinion, believed the ends of bimetallism would be furthered thereby, he should invite an international conference with other countries, looking to an international agreement for the restoration of the parity between gold and silver. It also authorized him, if in his opinion the object might be attained, to send abroad three commissioners, who should negotiate with the representatives of the different countries of Europe upon a basis looking to the reaching of the same result. That law is upon our statute books; it has never been repealed, and is still in force. A portion of it has been to an extent exercised; that is to say, the President of the United States, immediately upon the enactment of the law, did send abroad three commissioners, who endeavored, without result, to accomplish in Europe by private negotiation a basis for the restoration by international agreement of open mints upon a parity.

Now, this law, which is unquestionably still in force to the extent at least that a law can remain unfulfilled, comes up upon the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, not upon a report from any committee that it shall be added as an amendment to proposed legislation, not for the purpose of saving it, not for the purpose of protecting it, not for the purpose of making it more a law, but simply to emphasize the views which some of us hold upon the question of bimetallism.

I say if it should be true—I hope it is not—but if it should be true that a majority in this Senate should vote down the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire—few of the Senators here being as much interested in it as are he and I and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]—then I say that it would, when a future attempt to exercise it took place, at least throw a moral cloud upon the title of that law, and people who oppose the President's appointing a different commission or oppose the President's calling a new conference would point to the fact that a majority in this Senate had voted against reenacting the law. I say, therefore, that it is an unnecessary cloud on the title of the law. I hope I have made that clear to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought the other House had some rights in this matter and that the Senate alone could not repeal any existing statute; and yet the Senator contends that the action of the Senate in refusing to reenact this statute would repeal it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, no. I hope the Senator will not reassert that, for it is not what I said at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am only asserting my poor, lame conclusion as to your contention. I may be wrong, but I believe I can understand what a man says when he speaks. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator does understand it in the lamest sort of fashion if he so understands it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire only to say that the law of which the Senator from Colorado has been speaking, and which it is proposed by my amendment to reenact, passed both Houses of Congress on a yea-and-nay vote, with only 4 negative votes in the House of Representatives and 4 in the Senate.

Mr. President, it seems to me—although I desire to act with deference toward wiser men—that the best and most appropriate thing that this Senate can do here and now is to put this reenacting provision upon the proposed amendment which the committee has reported to the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, what is the purpose of the committee in offering the amendment which the Senator from Rhode Island has reported? It says:

> That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism, provided the same be secured by concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver.

Now, the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire is to show how what is implied in this proposed amendment is intended to be carried out. I for one do not believe that there is any intention whatever on the part of the majority here to carry out what is provided for, or what is intimated in this proposed amendment. If they intend to carry it out, and if they ever expect to undertake to bring about another international conference, or ever intend to send abroad a commission for the purpose of negotiating with other countries, I can see no reason why the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire should not prevail; but, on the contrary, if the intention is not to carry it out, if it is intended to be a simple declaration made here for campaign purposes and not to have the effect of law, or to affect the action of the Government, then, of course, there would be a reason why the proposed amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire should not be attached.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Senator of the opinion that anything in this bill affects the act of 1897, providing for the appointment of monetary commissioners?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. No; I am not.

Mr. SPOONER. Notwithstanding the passage of this bill you would still regard that act in force?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I would, and I do.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is clearly right about it.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment to the amendment, and then against the amendment proposed by the Finance Committee. I shall do so simply because I consider this whole business, so far as these amendments are concerned, as a mere pretext in the nature of a fraud, if not actually one.

We have had this sort of thing here before. In 1893, when a majority in Congress passed the act repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, an amendment was proposed and carried in the Senate to the effect that we favored bimetallism and the free coinage of silver, and every Senator who voted for the repeal of that purchasing clause knew that he was striking almost a fatal blow at the coinage of silver and against the idea that silver bullion could be turned into standard money.

We had a more conspicuous example of this kind of legislation when the Paris treaty was ratified, when, in order to secure votes to carry that treaty through the Senate, the McEnery resolution was coupled with it—a mere shallow ford to enable some Senators to pass over from one side of that question to the other, which they did. That amendment was thrown into the waste-basket, as those of us who were opposed to the treaty then said would be the result, and it has never been heard of since.

Now it is solemnly proposed, in the greatest and most dignified deliberative assembly in the world, to assassinate silver, to murder it as effectually as prussic acid or the dagger could do it, and then hypocritically pretend that we want silver coinage and bimetallism!

Why, Mr. President, suppose these amendments are adopted and we send commissioners to Europe to ask the great powers to join us in an attempt to establish bimetallism throughout the world, will we not be met with this bill, which declares in the first ten lines that gold is to be the unit of value, then goes on turning everything into gold, and takes the bonded debt of the Government and solemnly declares that the bonds can be paid in coin and makes them gold bonds? Are foreigners such idiots and such asses as not to know what that means? Will they not say, "You have just gone on the gold standard; here is the act you have passed; all the friends of silver in the United States opposing it and all the gold-standard men advocating it, and now you come to us with your hands reeking with the blood of the white metal and ask us solemnly to go into an arrangement to revivify it and make it standard money?"

Mr. President, we have put the United States now into the great scramble for gold; we have joined England, and every intelligent man in this country knows it. We are now preparing to make any sort of sacrifice, and will be obliged to do it, if we pass this bill, to obtain gold. We are just as much for gold as was the message which Queen Victoria sent the other day to Parliament, between the lines of which could be read, "more men, more arms, more gold." England to-day, as all the world knows, is fighting for the gold mines in southern Africa; yet the pretense is made that she is fighting for human rights; and now we are to strike down silver. I have no patience with any man who tells me that that is not the object of this bill. Then we are invited to go into a farce, an absolutely roaring farce, by carrying this bill abroad, and saying, "Well, we have turned everything into gold, made our bonds payable in gold, made gold emperor; we have bowed down like a lot of slaves before the golden calf; and we come here now and ask you to help us to undo our work and to give us bimetallism."

Mr. President, I am not prepared to be a party to any such transaction. We have come, as every intelligent man in this country knew we would come, to the naked, square, face-to-face issue between the single gold standard and bimetallism. Pass this bill and the last chance for bimetallism has been destroyed. This country is the only hope for the coinage of silver as standard money. If we with our great resources, producing more and exporting more than any people in the world, can not sustain the white metal, can not say to all the world, "Here we stand, the greatest producing country in the world and of the largest resources, prepared to champion bimetallism against all the world, if necessary; if you can do without us, we can do without you"—if we abandon that position, it is ridiculous to talk about our ever doing anything for the great cause of bimetallism, the cause of humanity, the cause of the people for whom the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] spoke to-day, the toiling masses of mankind, who under legislative processes are now made to labor for those who toil not and do not spin.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] does not fail to understand and appreciate the wide difference between the two cases to which he has referred. The proposition that this bill simply reaffirms the gold standard was met with a general denial by Senators on the other side of the Chamber. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire himself (and if his speech had any other purpose or effect I can not conceive what it was) to deny that we were on a gold standard, and to point out the evils which would arise to the people of this country, and to the people of India incidentally, if a gold standard was adopted by the United States. This suggestion that we are on a gold standard is not one which meets with general acquiescence. If it were this bill would not be here to-day.

As to the other suggestion made by him, it is that we should reenact a law now in existence, for no man on either side of this Chamber doubts that the act of 1897 is now in full force and effect. We understand the tactics of the Senator from New Hampshire. He deceives no one by his amendment. He may follow this by one to reaffirm the legislation by which we sent a commission to Paris in 1878 or in 1881, or the legislation which resulted in a convention at Brussels, or perhaps by the reenactment of the whole Revised Statutes, if he can by that process defeat this bill. I hope his amendment will be voted down; but its defeat will not, I assure the Senator from Colorado, change the opinion of a single Senator as to the vital force and effect of the act of 1897.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I concur in the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. I do not want to be regarded as voting for a scheme to deceive the people. The suggestion that this bill is not intended to interfere with an international agreement that may be hereafter made seems to me entirely outside of the fact. The bill itself adopts the gold standard for this purpose. What stronger argument could there be against an international agreement for bimetallism than for this country to abandon it altogether? This bill changes the present law.

It has been well said that under existing law we were bimetallists in the use of the coin, although not in the coinage. Under existing law the silver that is coined has the same function that the gold that is coined. We are bimetallists in the use of silver, and so is France, and so are many other countries, although we have ceased to coin it. We have not adopted the gold standard. It was adopted, it is true, by the act of 1873, but that law was changed and repealed by the act of 1878, which reestablished the silver dollar and provided for its coinage.

The Bland-Allison Act, which restored the silver dollar, has never been repealed. The purchasing clause has been modified and repealed and worked over considerably, but the body of the act reestablishing the standard silver dollar has never been repealed. Every obligation of the Government to-day is payable in silver equally with gold, and we have over 400,000,000 silver dollars which do the same duty as gold dollars. This bill deprives them of that function. The first section of the substitute provides:

> United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, when presented to the Treasury for redemption, shall be redeemed in gold coin of such standard.

Then it provides for a reserve of gold. "Gold coin" goes all the way through. Every time the word "coin" is used it is qualified by the use of the word "gold," a new departure never before adopted in this country.

While we had 400,000,000 silver dollars doing duty as money we could appeal to European countries with some propriety and ask that we have international bimetallism. There was some plausibility in that, because all our obligations were then payable equally in silver and gold. If commissioners go over there now, the European countries will say, "All your obligations are payable in gold. You have taken away the legal-tender power of the silver dollar to pay the bonded debt. You have your reserve in gold. You are dealing on a gold basis, and you have declared that the gold standard is the existing standard." It was never so declared by law. The only declaration to that effect was made in the St. Louis platform. That was the first time it was called the existing gold standard. While the use of gold and silver were the same, while each performed the same functions, nobody ever dreamed that there was any existing gold standard. We complained that no more silver could be coined.

It was the exemption from the gold standard which saved this country from utter ruin. The four or five hundred million dollars of silver coin which was issued under the Bland-Allison Act and the Sherman Act created prosperity in this country; and as quickly as it was cut off universal paralysis followed and would have continued to this day if it had not been for the accidental and abnormal production of gold and the war with Spain, which created activity.

Now is a poor time to adopt the gold standard—when you make all our obligations payable in gold—if we ever intend to call upon foreign countries to join us in reestablishing bimetallism. To say that such a step is not intended to embarrass our negotiations is to stultify ourselves. I will not vote for the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. I will not vote for the amendment of the committee. I stand with the Senator from Missouri, opposed to the entire subterfuge.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, if there is any virtue at all in this bill it is that it settles the vexed question of coinage. If the question is to be kept open and we are at the gold standard now, it is difficult for me to conceive why we should legislate on the subject of coinage at all.

If the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire is unnecessary because the statute which he seeks to reenact remains in force, then the amendment offered by the Committee on Finance is equally unnecessary. Why leave a statute in force that provides for a commission to seek an international agreement and at the same time declare that the act we are about to pass is not to be construed to interfere with an international agreement? It occurs to me that it is wholly unnecessary to adopt either amendment if the committee be right that the act proposed to be reenacted by the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire is to remain in full force and effect. Why encumber this bill with anything about international agreements if we leave unrepealed, unmodified, an act which provides for international agreement?

The truth is, it does seem to me, that the Senator from Missouri is right in his assumption that this amendment is intended to affect votes and not to affect the law. Therefore I am opposed to it. I believe that we have reached the point when this country intends to declare in favor of the gold standard, and the declaration ought to be unequivocal, and it ought not to be accompanied by a pretense that under some other conditions we are going back to silver coinage, when no man believes there is any possibility within the next ten years of any international agreement reestablishing silver coinage.

Mr. President, I maintain, too, that the amendment offered by the Finance Committee is not consistent with all the provisions of this bill. The first section provides that—

> United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, when presented to the Treasury for redemption shall be redeemed in gold coin of such standard.

The act provides that, in order to keep good the guarantee fund in the Treasury, from time to time bonds may be sold and the gold realized by the sale of those bonds shall be used to keep that fund good—up to a hundred and fifty million dollars. Those bonds are made payable at the Treasury of the United States after one year from the date of their issue and to be payable, principal and interest, in gold coin of the present standard.

Now, we have an international agreement; we agree on free coinage, upon a ratio which it is expected will keep the two metals at par with each other. Are the Treasury notes to be paid in the new coinage? Are these bonds to be paid in the new coinage? Or are we to establish a coinage under international agreement, which is to pay all debts except the greenbacks and Treasury notes and bonds issued in virtue of this act?

Mr. ALDRICH. That would depend entirely upon the nature of the agreement and what was done under it.

Mr. LINDSAY. Can we make an agreement with England and France and Germany to establish a new ratio between silver and gold and go to free coinage and provide through that contract that we will pay our creditors in the money coined under that agreement when we have agreed to pay them in standard gold of the present value?

Mr. ALDRICH. I assume that we would never make a contract with other nations to violate a contract of our own.

Mr. LINDSAY. The Senator from Rhode Island assumes that which is true—that we would never make a contract with a foreign nation to regulate our coinage at all—and therefore the amendment offered by the Committee on Finance, like the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, is either wholly unnecessary or else is not intended to accomplish the object it purports to intend to accomplish.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, it is immaterial to me, in the view I take of the proposed amendment, whether the advocates of this bill are in good faith or not in offering it. I believe we have been on a gold standard ever since 1873; I believe we are on a gold standard now, and I believe the purpose of this bill is to perpetuate that gold standard. It is useless to inquire into the good faith of those who offer this amendment providing for an international agreement to fix a parity of value between gold and silver. I can see no use for any such agreement. All agreements of that character have heretofore failed. The efforts made by the commission of which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] was so distinguished a member show that all endeavors in that direction will meet, in my opinion, with like failure.

Mr. President, I do not believe that an international agreement between the nations of the world can affect the value of the commodities gold and silver any more than it can affect the value of any other commodity. I hold that governmental action has no control whatever over any kind of value, money value included, and I believe that an international agreement would be as impotent to hold the two metals together at a parity as action taken by the United States alone. I believe that if governments can affect values at all the contention of the Bryanites is good, that the United States can control the value of those two metals by legislative action.

Mr. President, I believe that the battle of the standards was fought and lost by the Silverites in 1896. There may be a recurrence of that fight, but it will be only a skirmish. I believe that the forces of silver were then completely annihilated and routed, and I believe the course of this debate shows that all efforts upon the part of the Silverites to secure financial legislation to uphold the value of a depreciated metal will meet with failure.

Now, sir, why insert this amendment? Is there any hope of its fruition? If there is not, and the past shows us there is no hope, is not the good faith of the proponents of this measure to be questioned? Is it not a small tub thrown to a large whale? Is it not a sop to Cerberus? Is it not a piece of politics interjected into a financial bill? That will be the natural inquiry of the public, and that inquiry will be answered in the affirmative.

Mr. President, while I will not vote for this amendment, I will vote for the whole bill, whether the amendment is in it or not. There are a good many things in this bill that I do not like. There are a good many things which I think can be improved. I do not like the bond feature of the bill. I think that is very faulty. However that may be, I hope that future legislation will remedy the evils of that feature of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. VEST. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire is very pertinent, even though it be a reiteration of a statute, and I do not believe that a negative vote will have any effect whatever in diminishing the authority of the President to appoint a commission if he sees fit to do it. I doubt the utility of his amendment, however, as in any degree tending to the effect which he desires. I do not believe there is any intention on the other side of the Chamber or in the Administration of having bimetallism under any condition whatever, either independently or by international concurrence and cooperation; but as the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island has put into his bill something about bimetallism, that it is to be hoped for, I do not see why the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire should not also be adopted.

Now, the Senator from Rhode Island who has charge of this bill, in the very able address which he delivered here in proposing the substitute for the House bill took occasion to say that if there was any hope of bimetallism at all it was through his party. And he also took advantage of that occasion to say that those on this side or on the other side who pretended to be in favor of bimetallism were in fact monometallists, and that those who pretended to want the coinage of both metals, free at the mint, both legal tender, were in fact not what they claimed to be, bimetallists, but were silver monometallists. I thought then, when the distinguished Senator was expressing himself in that fashion, that it required an amazing hardihood for him or anybody else, in face of all the facts, in face of the votes in both Houses, in face of the platforms and professions of both parties, to make that statement.

Nothing has happened to impeach the sincerity and honesty of those who profess to be bimetallists. There is nothing in their course here or in the other House, there is nothing whatever in any of the stump speeches made by the advocates of bimetallism that has yet proved their insincerity, but I will say that there has been on the other hand, on the part of the party to which the Senator from Rhode Island belongs, which has continued to profess bimetallism up to a very recent date, an absolute discrepancy with the professions of its platform, made, in my opinion, to catch votes, and with the arguments submitted here and on the stump.

Therefore I do not see, if the Senator who has charge of the bill has concluded to hold out to anybody, voters or others, the hope that through this bill or through his party anything can be done to favor concurrent international bimetallism, why the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire is out of place. There has been enough reaffirmed and reiterated in this bill which gentlemen who have advocated the measure on the other side have declared to be already the existing law. Then why should the objection apply to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire?

I should like to see this amendment voted upon. I should like to test to-day again the sincerity of the other side of the Chamber. As I said at the beginning, I can see no particularly good results to come either from the law as it stands or as it may be reiterated or reaffirmed, because we know that there is little to hope for in that direction after failure by the commission headed by the honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], which presented the matter to an administration that may be considered more than one-half friendly to the cause of bimetallism, with Mr. Balfour decidedly a bimetallist, with the secretary of agriculture decidedly a bimetallist—and, by the way, he submitted the ablest argument for bimetallism ever submitted—with the premier himself in favor or bimetallism, with a very large and growing class of intelligent financiers and publicists becoming more and more every day in favor of bimetallism, and with Mr. Balfour complaining of the dense ignorance of the English people on the financial question that prevented them all from coming to bimetallism.

I do not see how anything is to be reached of any benefit or importance to this country so long as we have a party in power that professes one thing and practices another; so long as you have a President who sends a commission abroad to do a certain thing and discredits that commission by sending a message here approving an instrument prepared by an unofficial body of men engaged in a particular interest, absolutely contrary and adverse to it, and when the principal officer of the Treasury of the United States, the honorable Secretary, engages himself, while the commission was busy in its negotiations, with declaring to the whole world that his party intends to firmly establish the single standard. I say this proves something of the inutility, but so long as we have the profession in the bill itself that there is a hope of bimetallism, why should you fail, for fear the President may reach a wrong conclusion, to reiterate again that he should make a further effort to secure the concurrence of other nations in establishing bimetallism, if not upon the ratio of 16 to 1, upon a ratio that may be agreeable.

Lord Aldenham, who has been governor of the Bank of England and is supposed to be acquainted with these matters, in his testimony said he had not the slightest doubt that the United States itself could support the double standard, but with the concurrence of the mints of India there could be no doubt about it. He favored it, and other gentlemen of influence there favored it, and yet there was a bucket of cold water thrown upon it when they were warming to the efforts of the American commission. Lord Salisbury must have been amazed when he read in the papers the action taken by the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury when the commission, headed by the honorable Senator from Colorado, was engaged in negotiations. But however that may be, I can not see how the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire is at all out of place, and I for one shall be very glad to support it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], on which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. PETTUS. I object to a vote being taken to-day on any of these amendments. It is contrary, sir, to the unanimous-consent agreement of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have to overrule the objection of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PETTUS. Will the Chair oblige me by having the unanimous-consent agreement read?

Mr. ALDRICH. There was a distinct understanding that amendments should be voted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Every motion is entitled to a vote when it is under consideration, unless there is a unanimous-consent agreement that it shall be postponed.

Mr. PETTUS. Will the Chair allow the unanimous-consent agreement to be read?

Mr. CHANDLER. Let it be read.

Mr. PETTUS. It says all the votes shall be taken on the amendments and the bill to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

AGREEMENT TO VOTE ON H. R. 1.

February 15, 1900.—Agreement, by unanimous consent, that the vote upon the passage of H. R. 1 and pending amendments be taken some time during Thursday, the 15th of February, and that two days, including the 15th, shall be given to the discussion of amendments under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, that matter was discussed this morning in the hearing of the Senate, and an agreement was reached that we should take the votes on amendments to-day.

Mr. PETTUS. I never heard of any other unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was done this morning. I am not sure whether the Senator from Alabama was here or not, but that was clearly the purpose of the original agreement, the understanding being that the vote should be taken on the bill and pending amendments. Of course that means the amendments which are pending at the time the final vote is taken, not amendments that are offered and pending to-day.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I should like to hear this new agreement read, if there was any new agreement. I never heard of it. I have been here most of the morning. I should have objected to it if I had heard it.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was not a new agreement. It was an interpretation of the old agreement.

Mr. PETTUS. I have never heard of any interpretation of the old agreement.

Mr. President, this vote ought not to be taken to-day. The agreement was that it should be taken to-morrow, and it ought not to be taken to-day, because the whole theory of the general consent was that we would go on discussing this measure and all the amendments to it, or any amendment that might be proposed to it, and that after we had done that we would not discuss anything, but vote on the amendments to the bill and on the bill itself. That agreement ought to be carried out; and unless there is a positive agreement to the contrary, I insist on its being carried out.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from Alabama or any other Senator wants to speak upon this amendment, certainly there is no objection to that. There can not be any objection to it.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I only desire to say that it has been the impression of Senators in this immediate neighborhood that we were going to vote on the bill and amendments to-morrow. I understood that the order is to vote to-morrow upon the amendments that are pending. That does not debar us from amendments we are ready to vote on to-day; but the Senator from North Carolina who sits next to me [Mr. PRITCHARD] has gone out, and he expressed the opinion that no vote was to be taken to-day.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from North Carolina came to me and said he was paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN]. He made an arrangement, he said, with the Senator from South Carolina to observe a pair on these amendments.

Mr. MCLAURIN. He understood that there was to be a vote, because he made arrangement with me for a pair.

Mr. MASON. Then that was after his conversation with me. I simply wanted him to be set right and understood. He must have seen the chairman of the committee after the conversation with me.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I was under the impression——

Mr. PETTUS. If the Senator from Colorado will allow me an inquiry, I want to know if there is any evidence, and what that evidence is, of the agreement made this morning?

Mr. ALDRICH. There was a conversation which took place, joined in by Senators on both sides of the Chamber, as to what should be the course of business to-day. The statement was made by me, as I recollect it, that we would vote upon these propositions as the discussion upon them ceased, and that suggestion met, so far as I am aware, with no objection from any source, and it seemed to meet with general acquiescence.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understood the unanimous consent asked for by the Senator from Rhode Island to be that to-morrow, at no fixed hour, but on to-morrow, this bill and all amendments that should be pending at the time should be voted on. After he had submitted his proposition, I suggested that two days—to-day and to-morrow—should be devoted to the consideration of amendments under the ten-minute rule, and that was agreed to, my understanding being that each amendment would be offered and discussed under the ten-minute rule and that the amendments would be acted on one after another until the time came to-morrow when the vote on the bill would be taken. It seems to me it would be productive of endless confusion for us to lay aside all the amendments that are here and have a running discussion on the proposed amendments and have them taken up by the dozen and voted on to-morrow. It appears to me that we can vote on them more intelligently, more directly to the purpose, and that our reasons in casting our votes will be better understood, by voting on them when the discussion has ceased on every amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado was recognized.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to take the floor if the Senator from Connecticut wishes to be heard.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I desire to make an inquiry. If the amendment now pending is not to be voted upon until some time to-morrow, how can any other amendment be offered to day and discussed? Has this amendment got to be kept before the Senate until the time of the final vote, or how can it be laid aside except by being laid upon the table, and then can it be recalled? It seems to me that the necessities of the situation require that as an amendment is proposed and discussed and the discussion upon it has ended we must proceed to a vote upon it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss the question that has been discussed, but I should like to discuss the amendment for a few minutes if I can start now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. I regard it as of very little consequence whether the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire should be attached to the amendment of the committee or whether the amendment of the committee should pass without it. I do not believe that it is of any consequence whatever. It is pretty difficult for me to express my opinion about it without appearing to be offensive, which I do not desire to do.

Mr. President, the provision which was put in the platform at St. Louis was not put there for the purpose of being executed. Everybody who was there knew that. The plain people of the country did not know it. People who were not acquainted with the devious methods of politics—the methods of catching votes—thought it meant something. We who had some experience in such matters knew that it meant nothing.

Soon after the election was over one of the great New York dailies, a Republican paper, used the following language:

> Considerable has been said about the incidental reference in the Republican national platform to another international conference. No sensible person was deceived by that portion of the platform. Everybody understood its purely Pickwickian character. It was intended chiefly to ease the way for Republican candidates in the silver-mining States. People who take such planks seriously make themselves laughingstocks. It is just as well to be frank about this matter.

Mr. President, I notice that the Republican press of the country, the large Republican press, are very much disgusted with the amendment of the committee, and they are speaking of it in terms of condemnation. So far I have not seen any suggestion from any Republican paper friendly to it, but I have here an article from the Baltimore American, which is a Republican gold-standard paper, in which they complain quite bitterly of this amendment and say it ought not to be offered, etc.

> This is a mischievous addition to the measure. The purpose of the financial bill is to settle the currency question, but the amendment is in the other direction. There can be no such thing as bimetallism in this sense, no matter if all the nations of the earth agree to it.

Mr. President, that is the statement of the great mass of the leading Republicans of to-day. I find, taken from the Times-Herald a few days ago, a statement of the same character. The Times-Herald is authority in Republican circles. The proprietor of it claims to have been the author of the gold-standard platform at St. Louis. I believe there has been some controversy between him and some other members of his party as to who is entitled to it, and that question I do not feel competent entirely to settle. He is a recognized authority in the Republican party. I have the Washington Post's statement on it, and I am going to read what it says. The Times-Herald was speaking of this international clause:

> It was adopted with the expectation that overtures to foreign countries would be rejected, and so prevalent was this belief that the campaign of 1896 was fought on a straight issue between gold and silver. The Democrats said that the Republicans were for the single gold standard and the Republicans acknowledged the truth of the assertion. When the election returns came in on that memorable day in November, 1896, the people had made the appointment of a commission unnecessary, and absolved the winning party from its bimetallic professions.

Mr. President, I do not agree with that. I know that the Republicans in my section of the country, and in sections of the country that I campaigned in—that was in the West—were contending that this bimetallic provision was the valuable one in it. The Times-Herald continues:

> Thus the question has been determined twice—once by a popular vote, again by a useless embassy, and why resurrect the deep-buried corpse at this late day? The amendment coming after such facts as we have noted is less sincere than the dubious platform utterances, less useful than the wandering commission.
> Senator JONES affects to interpret it as a sign that the Republicans are scared, but they know that they are stronger without it than with it, and that is proof of the irrational timidity or excessive conscientiousness of Senator ALDRICH.

Mr. President, I never heard him charged with either, more particularly the latter.

> Though it was adopted by the Finance Committee of the Senate, it is to be hoped that the Senate will prepare it for the last sad rites at the earliest opportunity.
> If the Senate wishes to fulfill public expectation, it will drop the refunding and bimetallic clauses of its currency bill and go back to the House bill.

I think that is undoubtedly the Republican sentiment of the country; I mean of the managers; because I am compelled in treating of this matter to treat the subject as the Republican party appears to treat it—not with reference to what the masses want or what the masses think, but what the bosses want and what the bosses think. It is absolutely ridiculous to put the provision in the bill.

That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism: Provided, The same be received by the concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world, and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver.

Why, Mr. President, it absolutely means nothing. It will have no force or effect. It will be of no binding character upon the conscience of the most conscientious of Republicans, and certainly it will have no effect upon the conscience of the average politician. It is simply trifling with a great subject. It is rather humiliating to me that the committee should believe that they can get votes in the next campaign by talking to the people to the effect that this bill is no obstacle to international bimetallism. You are going into this legislation, you declare, to establish permanently the gold standard, and as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] said, there is probably some advantage in having an established standard.

We do not intend that it shall be permanent standard—that is to say, if we can persuade the people to intrust others than the Republican party with power, we intend to repeal it; but until that is done it must be a permanent standard; it must be the rule of conduct of all branches of the Government; and it must have such an effect upon the world as must result when a great nation like ours goes to the gold standard. It is not possible not to place an obstacle there, no matter what its intention may be. The best of possible intentions may exist in the mind of every man here that it shall not place any obstacle, but it does place it.

Mr. President, in my judgment it is intended to place an obstacle in the way of bimetallism. It is inconsistent with the suggestion that the gold standard is the desirable standard. In a condition that nobody has practically complained of we are establishing the gold standard for the purpose so often expressed, as I said before when I spoke to-day, to place it beyond the possibility of Executive interference unless both branches of Congress and the Executive should be in accord.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Rhode Island, the mouthpiece of the committee, that I think it is a good deal of a letting down from a great committee to come in here with a statement so childish and so foolish as that it is not intended to place an obstacle in the way of bimetallism. What is intended by law must be determined when the law comes to be executed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's ten minutes have expired. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] demands the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment. Is there a second?

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, does the Chair rule that a vote can be taken to-day without unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question to a vote unless the Senate determines otherwise.

Mr. PETTUS. I object.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. I should like to be allowed to make a suggestion to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that these two amendments are practically here. I suppose the Senator might take ten minutes on the other amendment if he wants to speak.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to make a suggestion. I think that the agreement to vote covered the entire time that was to be devoted to ten minutes' debate, because, as stated by the Senator from Arkansas, after the agreement had been made to confine the debate to ten minutes on Thursday and act upon the bill then, that time was enlarged so as to include to-day, upon the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas. I understand that the same agreement that was applicable to Thursday to act upon amendments as we went along was extended back another day, and that he simply asked for an enlargement of that arrangement so as to extend over the day preceding the final vote. I so understood it. I thought we would act upon these amendments as we came to them. It would lead to great confusion if we were to debate the whole question of all the amendments and then vote upon them. The orderly way of doing business, it seems to me, is exactly in accordance with the agreement, as I understood it at the time, simply enlarging the time so as to include to-day. That is what I understood.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I was present when the agreement was entered into. It was very clear in my mind at the time. It was understood that we should have a vote as we went along with the debate on the various amendments. But the RECORD governs these things, sir. Whatever difference of opinion we may have, there is one common arbiter, and that is the RECORD. It has been read, and I was surprised to see what was in it. Notwithstanding, it fixes this question, and we can not violate the agreement unless it is done by unanimous consent. We can not, under that agreement, vote on amendments to-day. We can not go back to interpret the RECORD, for the language of the agreement is plain and distinct.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama what his contention is in regard to voting on amendments. Is it that we can not vote until the final vote is taken upon the bill?

Mr. PETTUS. No, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. When can we vote on the amendments?

Mr. PETTUS. I go exactly by the agreement that you made yourself, and that is, not that there shall be no vote, but the language is that we shall vote on the amendments and on the bill upon Thursday.

Mr. ALDRICH. On pending amendments.

Mr. PETTUS. And on the bill. Yes; on pending amendments; and what do the words "pending amendments" mean? Unless it is a mere subterfuge, it can only mean the amendments that are pending to-morrow when we are to vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator contend that this amendment and no other amendment can be voted upon until when? When are we going to vote upon amendments?

Mr. PETTUS. My contention is that there can not be a vote on the amendments to this bill or on the bill itself until to-morrow.

Mr. ALDRICH. What time to-morrow will the amendments be in order?

Mr. PETTUS. The Senator is asking me a question that he can not answer himself.

Mr. ALDRICH. My contention is that amendments are now in order, because this general arrangement covered two days. If we can not vote to-day, we can not vote to-morrow on those amendments, under the Senator's contention, it seems to me, until a final vote is taken on the bill, and that involves an absurdity. I do not see how we are to vote to-morrow any better than to-day, the same rule applying to both days. If any Senator objects, I do not intend to press any vote at all, but it seems to me that it leads us into a rather ridiculous position.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If we are going to construe the agreement literally, we can not vote on amendments until after the bill is voted on, because the language attributed to the Senator from Rhode Island, and it appears in the RECORD, is this:

Then the understanding, as I understand it, is that we shall vote upon this bill and pending amendments on Thursday.

So, if we are to follow the literal meaning of the words, we must first vote on the bill and then vote on the amendments.

Now, I respectfully submit that it was the distinct understanding, when the Senator from Rhode Island submitted his proposition, that we should have a vote on the bill and amendments on Thursday, nobody understanding that it meant we were to vote first on the bill and then on amendments, but that we would discuss the amendments and dispose of the bill as the practice of the Senate had always been, one by one, until the bill was reached, and then that it should be voted on. Then I suggested that it would probably be better to have two days devoted to debate on amendments under the ten-minute rule than to have one, and the suggestion that we should have two days was agreed to. I think there can be no question that everybody understood that the debate on the first day of the two would be under exactly the same circumstances and conditions that the debate on the second day should be.

Mr. PETTUS. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. I merely desire to ask him a question.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. Do you contend that because the bill is named first that means necessarily that it must be voted on first?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not, but I was simply citing that to show what I regarded as the unreasonableness of the construction the Senator from Alabama was putting on this agreement. I think everybody in the Senate understood the agreement at the time it was entered into.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator give us the page of the RECORD he is reading from?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is page 947. Then the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said:

Including the 15th.

Mr. ALDRICH. That two days, including the 15th, shall be given to the discussion of amendments under the ten minute rule, with the further understanding that pending that time, or during the time between now and the 15th of February, this bill shall remain the unfinished business after 2 o'clock.

I do not think there can be any doubt that the understanding of the Senate was that the amendments were to be disposed of as they were discussed. I never heard the question raised in the Senate before. I never heard of an instance of taking up an amendment here and debating it without voting upon it after the debate was concluded. That having been the practice of the Senate from time immemorial, the unanimous consent asked for by the Senator from Rhode Island referred, of course, to what was the unvarying practice of the Senate, and that was to dispose of the amendments as they were debated.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I appeal to the Senator from Alabama, as long as all the other members of the Senate except himself apparently understood the order in one way, to allow the rule to be modified, if it is necessary, by unanimous consent, that we may go on and consider the amendments and dispose of them in the manner suggested by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I have my reasons for not agreeing to the plan which the Senator from Rhode Island was kind enough to suggest to me. The Senate, of course, if it chooses to set aside its own agreement, can do so, but there are a number of persons who have said—in fact, everybody that I have heard speaking of it has said—that we would vote on Thursday, as we had agreed to do; and, so far as I am individually concerned, we will vote on Thursday or according to the will of the Senate.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I make a suggestion to the Senator from Alabama which, I think, will meet the views of the Senator from Rhode Island; which is that the unanimous-consent agreement be so modified that we vote upon amendments to-day as they come up, and then, if any Senator to-morrow shall desire a reconsideration and another vote, there shall be unanimous consent that it may be had. So that to-day we can vote upon some of the amendments as they come. I know some very good reason actuates the Senator from Alabama, as it always does when he takes a position; but if for some reason he shall desire to vote again on any particular amendment, we shall, by unanimous consent, have a reconsideration of the vote upon any such amendment which is voted upon to-day. Is that satisfactory to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ALDRICH. Perfectly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Would that be satisfactory to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. PETTUS. I have stated what my position is on this matter, and I propose to stand by it.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. PERKINS. As I understand it, the bill is now in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If the amendments are adopted to-day, when the bill is reported to-morrow to the Senate, it will be in order for my friend from Alabama, or for any other Senator, to offer the amendments again, when the Senate will again vote upon them, will it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PERKINS. Therefore, I think my friend from Alabama and all of us will be satisfied if we can vote to-day as in Committee of the Whole upon these amendments and vote upon them again to-morrow when the bill is reported to the Senate. Then my friend from Alabama may offer his amendment, and the Senator from Colorado, the Senator from New Hampshire, and others may offer their amendments, and we will again vote upon them to-morrow, and so we shall all have the privilege of going upon record to-day, Wednesday, and again on Thursday, if we desire to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The question, as I understand it, is now on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] to amend the amendment reported by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]—that is to say, a yea vote will put the amendment as proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire as a part of the amendment reported by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator correctly states the question.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I shall vote for that, and then vote against the amendment afterwards.

Mr. VEST. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAY (when Mr. BACON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. BACON] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. I understand he is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McLAURIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. If present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. I wish to say that I feel at liberty to vote under that arrangement upon all features of this bill. I vote "yea."

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. Unless some other arrangement is made, I am not allowed to vote.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that we transfer our pairs, the Senator from Alabama being paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and I with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. That will permit the Senator from Alabama and myself to vote, if it be agreeable. I make that suggestion to him.

Mr. PETTUS. I do not know how the Senator from Virginia would vote.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I assume the Senator from Virginia, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. PETTUS. I should vote "yea" on this question if I were allowed to vote at all, but I am opposed to the amendment as a whole.

Mr. SULLIVAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON], who has voted, but on this particular matter I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I inquire if that Senator has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Senator from West Virginia has voted.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Then I vote "yea."

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who is absent; but I will transfer that pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER], who is also absent, and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PROCTOR. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. I will transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] if he is not otherwise paired, and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE. My colleague [Mr. HOAR] is detained from the Chamber by illness. If he were present, he would vote "nay." I understand he stands paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] is recorded as voting, and I vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that my colleague [Mr. GEAR] is now paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. My colleague, if here, would vote "nay."

Mr. SCOTT (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO]. I am informed that he is absent from the Chamber, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BUTLER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON]. I should like to inquire if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is not paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. If so, I shall transfer my pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], who is absent, and I understand is not paired. I shall then be at liberty to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. BEVERIDGE (after having voted in the negative). I voted, having forgotten at the time that I have a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. CLARK], who is not present. I assume, if present, he would vote "yea," and therefore perhaps I ought not to be recorded as voting on this or the other amendment. So I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 45, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. CHANDLER to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to deny my statement that the first ten lines of this bill were only a reiteration of existing law. I never have taken the position that they were anything but a reiteration of existing law; not that the gold standard has been distinctly declared by the language of any statute. Gold has become the standard by the closing of the mints to silver, and there can be no more coinage of silver in this country, except for minor coinage, until Congress, with the concurrence of the President, or by a two-thirds vote, shall open the mints. So we are upon the gold standard to-day substantially by reason of the closing of the mints.

I understood that to be the effect of the first ten lines of this bill, a declaration of what is called the existing gold standard in America; and my contention has been from the first that if that gold standard was to be reiterated by legislation at this session it should be accompanied by the qualification as to the desire of the American people for bimetallism, which has been so often voted for in this Chamber and in political conventions.

Now I will read exactly what I said in the first opening lines of my remarks the other day. I said:

> The passage of this bill without adequate recognition of the desire and the determination of the American people that silver shall be remonetized is a defiance of the Republican platform of 1896, and without such recognition in the bill I can not give to it my vote.

Mr. President, it is proper that I should define what I would consider to be "adequate recognition of the desire and the determination of the American people" for bimetallism to be placed in this bill, which would make me willing to vote for it. It would be the adoption at the close of it of the declaration of the amendment which has just been rejected and the placing in front of the committee's amendment the declaration that "the United States from tradition and interest favor bimetallism."

I ask the Senator from Rhode Island, the chairman of the committee, to accept those lines which were in the platform of the Republican party in 1892, to admit them as a preliminary to the amendment which has been reported by the committee:

> The United States from tradition and interest favor bimetallism.

Will the Senator from Rhode Island allow that declaration? Then, perhaps, in committee of conference conclude to add—as I think the committee of conference will conclude that it is wise to add—the words which have just been voted down by the Senate, though my vote is of no importance. I shall be very willing to vote for the bill, although I deprecate very much the adoption, under any conditions, of the first ten lines of the bill, because they are entirely unnecessary.

Mr. ALDRICH. So far as I am concerned, I object equally to the reenactment of the Revised Statutes or to the incorporation of the platform of a political party into this bill.

Mr. President, in the remarks which I submitted upon the presentation of this bill to the Senate I stated that the United States through various legislative enactments had been committed to the policy of promoting international bimetallism and that the Republican party, through the declarations of its various political platforms, had declared in favor of international bimetallism. At the same time I stated that there was nothing in this bill, not a line, or a word, or a syllable, which placed any obstacle whatever in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism in the future.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] say that they do not believe in international bimetallism or in the possibility of its accomplishment. I will say to those Senators that there are many men in both political parties, as honest and as desirous of maintaining the public interests and the public honor as are those Senators, who do believe that international bimetallism is possible, and who have consistently advocated it in all the years since 1878.

I ask Senators, Does this bill in any one of its provisions place any obstacle in the way of international bimetallism? Does the fact that we are on a gold standard, admittedly so by the provisions of this bill, prevent the United States from taking any action looking to international bimetallism?

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not want to be interrupted at this point.

I have frequently heard the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and other Senators who believe in bimetallism call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is a great bimetallist party in England and one scarcely less important in Germany. Does the fact that those people live in gold-standard countries necessarily make their efforts in behalf of international bimetallism futile? Does the fact that certain governments, whose consent is necessary for the success of the plan, are now upon the gold standard prevent consideration of the question and place any insuperable obstacles in the way of its accomplishment?

I ask Senators, if there are any such, who believe there is something in this bill which does place an obstacle in the way of the accomplishment of this purpose—and whether it is a wise purpose or not is a question not involved in the amendment—to point out of the language the phrase, the word, that produces this result. This can not be done. We would not have felt obliged to have offered this amendment if it had not been for the repeated declarations of Senators upon the other side that by the adoption of this bill we would close the door to any attempt even to secure an international agreement. If it is honorable to state exactly what you mean in legislation, then this amendment has a thoroughly honest purpose.

Mr. ALLEN. I wanted to ask the Senator a question while he was on his feet, but I care nothing about it now.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. ALLEN. I wanted to ask him what there was in this bill that would permit the negotiation of international bimetallism?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not the purpose of this particular bill to promote international bimetallism or to affect that result in anyway, directly or indirectly.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, it is quite the custom in the Senate to talk one way and vote another. It has been during my experience here the custom of some Senators to talk in favor of a measure and then to vote against it. This bill is a gold bill from top to bottom, through and through, from cuticle to core and from core to cuticle. There is not a thing in it which would deceive any person into the belief that it favors international bimetallism or domestic bimetallism.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] says that there is nothing in this bill to prohibit international bimetallism. Mr. President, there is. Before international bimetallism can become an accomplished fact, before it can be negotiated, you will have to repeal this bill. This bill commits the United States to the single gold standard; it eliminates silver from our coinage, excepting as a subsidiary coin. The whole financial policy of the United States as declared by this bill is the policy of the single gold standard. Why undertake to deceive the people, or why does the Senator undertake to deceive himself, into the belief that there is anything in the Republican party, or in its history, or in the vote taken here within the last five or ten minutes which would indicate to the world that it is a bimetallic party?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island what would be the effect in morals and in law, if the refunding scheme embraced in this bill takes place and this Government issues gold bonds, for us to then negotiate with foreign countries for the rehabilitation of silver and a return to the bimetallic standard, our obligations outstanding being payable in gold? What would be the status? If there is nothing in this bill to prohibit or prevent our return to the bimetallic standard, how would you get around that position? How would you explain it? How would you litigate it? In other words, if the matter came before the Supreme Court, what would then be done to determine as to what the bonds would be payable in? Could we pay them in silver, even though we had restored silver?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator asks a question which is equivalent to this: If a man makes a contract payable in gold, would he be precluded from making another contract payable in silver in relation to another matter and at another time?

Mr. TILLMAN. That is in the bill, if I understand it. If the Senator will permit me, the provision in the bill is that you are to issue gold bonds. Suppose people propose to swap coin bonds for those gold bonds, I ask the Senator is there anything in the bill which would prevent it?

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill provides for the issue of a certain amount of bonds payable in gold, thereby constituting a contract between the United States and the parties who may hold those bonds; and I assume the United States would continue to pay those bonds in gold, whatever agreements it might make with other countries as to other matters, as I am sure we shall not repudiate any of our contracts.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, the position of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] that this bill, speaking with reference to the House bill or to the proposed substitute offered by the committee, interposes no obstacle to the accomplishment of bimetallism seems to me very astonishing. If I read the provisions of this bill aright, it interposes moral obstacles and legal obstacles, if not constitutional obstacles, to the accomplishment of that purpose.

One of the potent arguments against independent bimetallism to-day is the divergence between the commercial value of gold and silver. The making of any part of the obligations, public or private, payable in gold alone which are not now so payable tends to that extent to depreciate the value of silver and to widen that divergence, and to that extent increases the obstacles to the accomplishment of bimetallism.

Secondly, as pointed out by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], if this bill passes, making the public obligations of this nation payable specifically in gold, and such bonds are issued, it interposes a legal, if not a constitutional, obstacle to the bringing about of bimetallism. Before that can be done, and gold and silver stand precisely upon the same footing in the power of each to perform the duties of money, to constitute a legal tender in the payment of all debts, that discrimination and obstacle must be removed by the repealing of this legislation, by changing the obligation of that contract. Whether that can constitutionally be done is a doubtful question. While there is nothing in the Federal Constitution prohibiting the Federal Government or Congress from violating the obligation of contracts, there is such an inhibition as against the States; and the Supreme Court of the United States in the Sinking Fund cases held that by implication the Federal Congress was equally powerless to accomplish that inequitable result. Therefore, pass this law, and you have taken one other fatal step.

Mr. President, in view of these considerations, to place upon the face of this proposed statute a provision that it is not intended to accomplish those things which it does accomplish is a confession of the injustice of the measure itself. It is a declaration to the people that those who propose this measure have no confidence in it or that they can successfully appeal to their conscience and judgment for a vindication of the process by which this shall become a law.

Mr. President, bimetallism by international agreement, in my humble opinion, is not only morally impossible, but, taking into consideration the structure and constitutions of the different governments that are supposed to cooperate to bring it about, it is impossible in every sense. The delegates may agree, but they are not clothed with the power to enact into law and make potent as a law in the several governments they represent the agreement which they accomplish. After they have agreed all they can do is for the respective delegates to go back to the countries which they represent, and those countries will take up the matter in their proper legislative departments for action. They can not act concurrently. They can not act at the same instant. One will act first, if action is taken at all, and to that extent it is acting independently, and it has no assurance that any other government will follow its example in concurring in that action. Thus, in the end, whatever agreement may be come to, one nation must take the first step, and, by the potency of its example to concur, bring about the cooperation.

The contention of bimetallists in this country is that there can be no bimetallism except by the independent action of the governments. What government is more able, what more potent, what more interested than this great Government of the United States to take the first and initial step to bring about this achievement which all recognize as being desirable?

Mr. President, the proposed amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island to the pending bill is a virtual declaration against any form of bimetallism which is rationally possible under any circumstances. It proposes only possibly, contingently, upon condition, bimetallism by international agreement, which is an absurdity upon its face.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut and Mr. ALLISON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I am one of those who believe that we can not take any step which is more likely to advance the cause of international bimetallism than to let it be understood in the world that, until we can secure the concurrence of other nations, we are going to maintain the gold standard. If I am not mistaken—and I will appeal to the Senator from Iowa to say whether I am or not—our delegates to the last international bimetallic conference were confronted by the delegates of the gold-standard countries with the claim that we were approaching free-silver coinage in the United States; that the conditions here were such that we should be driven to it, and that we should be called upon then to carry the burden of free coinage alone, and therefore there was no inducement for gold-using countries to come into any international agreement.

I wish to say one other word, and that is all. There is nothing whatever to the contention that because we are declaring that a gold standard already exists and making our future bonds payable in gold we can not therefore properly, legally, and morally enter into any international agreement after that time. Whatever international agreement may be entered into will have to be with the concurrence of England and Germany, both of which are gold-standard countries. Whatever agreement may be entered into will operate in the future and not in the past to change the nature of contracts made by those Governments in the issuing of their obligations. Nobody would expect it to be retroactive. Everyone would expect that it would have operation only in the future. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate, but I should like to hear from the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, when the Senator from Connecticut sought the floor I also sought it with a view of saying a word upon this question.

The difficulty with our friends on the other side is that none of them are for bimetallism. They are for the single standard of silver, although nominally in favor of the opening of our mints both to silver and gold. They are silver monometallists and they do not comprehend, or, if they do, they do not admit, the force of the contention on our side, if I may use that word now, that there is no way to secure the concurrent and equal circulation of gold and silver side by side in a nation or among the nations except by fixing a ratio of equivalence between them that will enable a silver dollar to go into any country and be exchanged in any country for a gold dollar and will enable a gold dollar to go into any country and be exchanged for a silver dollar. I believe, and I speak for myself alone in this observation, that it is impossible to circulate side by side in any one country silver and gold unless you fix the ratio of equivalence between them which shall be equal to the commercial value of both metals in the markets of the world.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] this moment expressed very clearly the distinction between these two contentions. He contends that it is impossible to secure an international agreement (therefore this amendment will do him no harm), and that the only way is for each nation for itself to open its mints concurrently to both gold and silver. But that is not bimetallism. The Republic of Mexico has had for years and years nominal circulation and open mints upon an absolute equality to both silver and gold. In other words, statutory provisions by a single nation can not in the nature of things secure bimetallism unless that nation is strong enough to absorb all the silver that shall come to its mints and at the same time absorb the gold that comes there, and keep them upon an equality. I do not believe, and I say it frankly here, because I am not speaking now as a partisan, that with the disparity which there is between silver and gold at this time in the markets and in their commercial value as respects any of the old ratios, that any ratio established by us in this country, if it should be the absolute commercial ratio, would last a very long period of time, because the commercial value of the two metals would so vary, as they have varied, as to make it impossible for us to establish in and of ourselves a relation between the metals such as would enable both metals to circulate at a parity.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. I simply wish to ask the Senator from Iowa how it is, if his proposition be correct, that to-day the American silver dollar is at par in Europe?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the Senator's question with great pleasure. Why is it that our greenback is at par with gold in Europe? It is because we have a limited quantity of silver dollars. We have them in our own country exchangeable, as I have said, as respects all taxes and dues. We have a pledge three times over that we will maintain them at par in our country. I do not know how the fact may be, but I suppose it is true that in London our greenbacks and our silver dollars stand upon substantial equivalence with their gold money, because the only discount possible there would be such discount as would enable the holder of a silver dollar or a greenback to pay the cost of exchange—the transportation to our own country.

Mr. VEST. I will ask the Senator one question further, and then I will not disturb him again. Is it not the fact that the American silver dollar is at par in Europe because it has full legal-tender quality, and that this country, exporting a billion three hundred and fifty million dollars of domestic merchandise, is assurance to the whole world that they can buy all that we have to sell as well with the silver dollar as with gold? Is it not axiomatic that the legal-tender money of every country in the world is equal to the value of its salable commodities?

Mr. ALLISON. The question suggested by the Senator from Missouri is only a reenforcement of the argument I am making. It is the fact that our mints are not open to the unlimited and free coinage of silver and that we have statutory pledges and moral pledges that those dollars shall be maintained upon an equality in our own country, the legal tender, of course, having some influence. It is not very great, but it has some influence. The legal-tender quality has no relation to the fact that we coin silver now in limited quantities on Government account, with a pledge made over and over again, and repeated in this law, that we will maintain those dollars upon an equality with gold.

Mr. President, it may be true, as the Senator from Utah says, that it is an impossibility to secure an international agreement. If it is true, then we will not have it, and if we are dealing or conferring with foreign nations as respects a relation of equivalence between silver and gold at a commercial ratio, which we believe is the only way whereby that can be accomplished, we will be dealing with nations every one of which has the gold standard as we have and every one of which has a silver circulation in its country as we have. France has four or five hundred millions; Germany has a hundred millions of full legal-tender silver—the German thaler; and other countries are similary situated.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] appealed to me as respects the conference in 1892. I will state what was said to me over and over again, as I have no doubt it was said to others, not in public speeches and utterances, but it was said there by men of eminence and of knowledge, not only in respect of the political policies of Europe, but regarding the trend of political opinion in our own country. Some of them said: "We have been pinched with respect to gold and we are being pinched, but we believe that the trend of public opinion in the United States is such that your mints will be opened to the free and unlimited coinage of silver; and when your mints are so opened, the effect will be that all the gold which now circulates in the United States will be transferred to Europe, and thus will fill up our vaults and our treasuries and add largely to our gold supply, and thereby we will be relieved from the tension we have sometimes felt respecting a scarcity of gold."

I believe that one of the impediments in the pathway of bimetallism in the past was a belief on the part of many European statisticians and statesmen and financiers that we would go to a silver standard and thus relieve the gold in our country from its use here and give them an opportunity to replenish their gold supply in Europe. So, Mr. President, whatever may be the fate of the amendment now suggested, we can not take a single step unless it is with the concurrence of the commercial nations of Europe which we are to deal with, and they are not only gold-using but gold-standard nations.

I wish to emphasize what was said by the Senator from Rhode Island as respects my own belief. There is not a line or a syllable or a sentence in the amendment which the Senator now proposes or in the bill as it came to us from the House that puts in the pathway one single obstacle to the reopening of negotiations for international bimetallism at any time by our country or in any degree diminishes our duty or opportunity to meet a suggestion of international negotiation for that purpose from any other country. For myself I will say I think, under our present situation, it is not wise for us now to make that proposition to Europe. They ought to come to us and say, "At last we are ready to again deal with the question of the ratio of equivalence between the two metals that circulate in one way and another around the globe."

I have heard in this debate, over and over again, that we are seeking by this legislation to destroy the use of silver in the world. It is a notorious fact, drawn from all statistics, not only those of our own country, but the statistics of the world, that there has been more full legal-tender silver coined, which is now used in the world's supply, between 1873 and 1900 than was coined by all the countries of the world during a similar period prior to 1873. Therefore it is not a question whether the silver of the world shall be destroyed or abandoned, but it is a question for us to decide whether we now are willing, of our own volition, to transfer the standard of money, which has been a standard for twenty-five or thirty years, into a silver standard, which in the very nature and essence of the situation must displace the money and the contracts which have been made during the intervening period between 1879 and now.
